Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. The question in this case is in some degree a question of law. There are instructions or rather memoranda for the deceased's own use, and containing certain bequests which are not inserted in the will; and the question is whether the Court can pronounce that the bequests omitted form part of the will. To admit this allegation would be to go much beyond all former principle and precedent, and would be extremely dangerous. The necessary presumption is, that at the time of [572] the execution the paper contained the deceased's final intentions.

The deceased is pleaded to have had one side affected by paralysis, but that otherwise his health remained good till the last year of his life. In February, when his will was prepared, he was ill; and it is alleged that his eyesight was "extremely defective:" but the papers written by the deceased after the execution of the will shew that this statement is not warranted; and No. 3, the document from which he dictated his will, is written in a very small hand; so that if he at that time suffered under such a defect of sight as is alleged, he could not have read it. To admit, then, such alleged omissions to proof, requires some clear evidence in the deceased's handwriting, as, for instance, in Mr. Baron Wood's case. There the omission was palpable, and the instrument was in his own handwriting: the subsequent calculations, also in his own writing, proved the intention to demonstration; and the clause was in that case inserted. Here the evidence would only amount to something whereon to found a

(a) See Boughey v. Moreton, supra, 191, in notis.

(b) See Roberts v. Round, supra, 548.

(c) See Conyers v. Kitson, supra, 556.

(d) One of the parties claiming as a legatee was a feme covert, living apart from her husband on her separate property. The Court, on security for costs being given, accepted her sole proxy.

conjecture; and there is, as the will stands at present, a residuary clause under which the property in question would pass.

The will, regularly executed and attested, was written in the testator's presence and from his dictation, clause by clause, from memoranda previously prepared by himself; and yet, because his sight was defective, and one side had been affected by a paralytic stroke, it is to be supposed that he omitted by oversight the whole of these bequests. After the preparation the will was read over to him and was subsequently executed. If the Court were to interfere with such a will, what testa-[573]-mentary disposition would be safe? But the matter does not rest here; the deceased keeps the paper by him four or five months; it is then opened; he has an abstract made; he compares the first and second sheets with the abstract, and the rest is read over to him by another person; he talks of making alterations, and he does write some further memoranda for instructions; but these do not apply to the alleged omissions.

Now an attempt is made to introduce the clauses in the paper of memoranda, under a suggestion that they were omitted by oversight. Whether it was by oversight or from intention is bare conjecture and mere probability: it may not be improbable that they were overlooked in dictating the will; it may be possible that the non-insertion escaped his observation when the will was read over; but that is not sufficient. It would be dangerous in the extreme to allow alterations in an instrument, so executed, on parol evidence and declarations. In the cases that have taken place the evidence has been quite demonstrative; and it has always been required, 1st, that there should be some ambiguity in the instrument itself; next, that the proofs of the omission, or fraudulent suppression, should be clear beyond all doubt.(a) Here the utmost to which the plea brings the case is, that a mistake is not improbable. The Court must shut the door against such an attempt; and, upholding the principles hitherto acted upon, I shall reject the allegation.

The Court allowed the costs out of the estate.

[574] WHEELER AND BATSFORD v. ALDERSON. Prerogative Court, Trinity Term, 2nd Session, 1831.—The will (executed eight years before death) of a woman who, though guilty of excessive drinking and great extravagances, managed her own property, received her dividends, did various acts of business, corresponded rationally with her friends, and was not shewn to be under any delusion, cannot be set aside on the ground of insanity; and though such will—in total exclusion of distant next of kin (with whom she had quarrelled)—be in the handwriting of, and executed at the office of, her attorney (one of the executors and residuary legatees to a great amount, he and his family having also very large legacies) and the attesting witnesses speak to a bare execution; documents in her own handwriting, shewing both capacity and knowledge of contents, though not mentioning the residue, will supply the additional proof required by such circumstance.—In a case of perfectly sound mind, and free from any suspicion of imposition, evidence of bare execution is sufficient: but where the deceased's attorney is the drawer of the will, and the person principally benefited, the jealousy of the Court is excited, and demands more than proof of bare execution.—Delusion has been generally laid down as an essential constituent of derangement. Semble, that insanity has never been held to be established in any case where delusion has at no time prevailed.—Semble, that a lucid interval then exists when the mind is apparently rational on all subjects, and no symptom of delusion can be called forth.—Where clear and decisive insanity has been established at a prior time, acts of a doubtful character are of more force in proof of its existence at the time in question: and even subsequent decidedly insane acts may reflect back on acts otherwise equivocal; but when no decided acts, prior or subsequent, are proved equivocal acts, however numerous, will not establish insanity.—Intoxication is temporary insanity, ceasing with the exciting cause.—Witnesses speaking to transactions and conduct spread over many years, and not to specic facts fixed by time, place, and circumstances, are apt honestly to describe occasional extravagances as constant and perpetual habits.—Where no fixed and settled delusion is shewn, and consequently no decided actual insanity, and extravagant acts are accounted for by the excitement of liquor,

(a) See Draper v. Hitch, 1 Hagg. Ecc. 678. Harrison v. Stone, 2 Hagg. Ecc. 537.

while at times the mind was sound; in order to avoid a will it must be proved that the deceased was so excited by liquor, or so conducted himself during the particular act, as to be at that moment legally disqualified from giving effect to such act.

Elizabeth Morice, late of Gainsford Street, Horsleydown, died on the 10th of March, 1830, a widow aged 65 years, leaving a will dated 2d July, 1822, of which Henry Wheeler and Charles Batsford were executors and residuary legatees. This will was opposed by Mr. Alderson, second cousin and one of the next of kin, and was propounded by the executors.

An allegation pleaded on the part of the executors that in 1820 the deceased requested Batsford, her solicitor, to make her will and to be one of her executors; a few days afterwards she brought to his office instructions (A), dated 25 April, 1820, all in her own writing; that on Batsford reading them over to her she suggested various alterations, of which he made memoranda (B); that on 7th May, 1820, she wrote him a note (C); that a draft of a will (D) settled by counsel was read to her; previous to which Batsford abstracted the names of the legatees and the amount of the legacy to each on the back of B; that the deceased having stated the amount of her property in the funds, which at the then price was upwards of 30,000l., and the specific legacies amounting only to 22,300l., she directed the legacy of 2000l. to Francis Daniel, since deceased, to be made 5000l.; Batsford made the alteration in the draft, and interlined the memorandum in paper B; that a will engrossed from such draft was afterwards executed, and remained in her possession till she de-[575]-stroyed it on the execution of the will propounded. That in 1822 the deceased delivered to Batsford E, as part instructions, and also verbal instructions as to alterations in the will of 1820, declaring that she meant to leave to Batsford 20,000l.; and to Wheeler 10,000l., and to give them the residue; on Batsford's objecting to the inequality of these legacies, she acquiesced in leaving 10,000l. to each; she also directed other alterations, and Batsford in her presence made a memorandum of the legacies to him and Wheeler, and of the other alterations. That F was a letter from Mrs. Morice to Batsford. That a draft will (G) was drawn up; on being read over to or by the deceased she directed Sutton's legacy to be contingent on his being in her service; a legacy of 500l. each to be given to Woolley, her butcher, and Watts, her cheesemonger; and her jewellery to Mrs. Batsford; the preparation and execution of the will on the 22d July, and capacity: that soon after, Batsford at her request delivered to her a copy of her will (H), which on the 22d of April she gave to Wheeler, having previously herself made therefrom an abstract of the legatees and legacies (I), which she kept, and was found the day after her death, in her pocket-book.

The nature of the case set up in opposition to the will, and of that set up in the rejoining allegation, may be gathered sufficiently from the judgment.

The testamentary papers referred to in the executors' plea were as follows:—(a)

(a) The following additional testamentary papers were in the course of the proceedings brought into the registry:—

A paper of the 29th of March, 1820 (which had been torn to pieces), all in the deceased's writing, agreed with paper A, except that it omitted the legacy to Davis, and gave 1000l. each to his two sisters: it omitted the legacy to Brickenden, but gave to Watts 500l., and appointed Daniel sole executor: there was no residuary legatee.

An unexecuted will of January, 1817, five guineas to Davis; legacy to Harris in blank; to Knoller in blank: Brickenden and Mr. Ching five guineas each: Miss Daniel 5000l., her diamonds, plate, &c.: her three servants 25l. per annum if in service: Daniel sole executor and residuary legatee.

In the draft of this will (dated December, 1816) the legacy to Harris was first 200l. per annum, then changed to 5000l., and to Knoller first 200l. per annum, then 1000l.

These two papers were drawn up by a lawyer. The alterations in the draft being in Dr. Daniel's writing.

A will of the 27th of September, 1816, Sarah Cook 50l. per annum, Mrs. Aldridge 2000l., Harris 5000l.: Miss Daniel residuary legatee, Daniel and Aldridge joint executors, with 5000l. each.

With this will was brought in the following note:—

[576] A—In deceased's writing.

This is the last will and testament of me Elizabeth Morice of Gainsford Street in the parish of [577] Saint Johns in the county of Surry widow being of sound mind and good understanding bodily health [578] do hereby revoke all other wills codicils whatever in the name of God Amen—I first resign my soul to Almighty God who

---

September 16, 1816.

Dear Sir,—I will give you a call on Wednesday next in the morning, as I wish you to git two witnesses to sign a paper which I shall bring with me. With best respects to Mrs. Aldridge from your sincere friend. ELIZABETH MORICE.

I will make you smile at a trick I was plyd on the day of the funeral, which I found out by chance.

(Superscribed) THOMAS ALDRIDGE, ESQ., Howard Street, Strand.

A will of the 31st of July, 1815, Mrs. Lockhart 50l. per annum, Harris 200l. per annum, Knoller 100l. Dyne, sole executor and residuary legatee.

A codicil (not in the deceased's writing) dated the 31st of August, 1816 (the day of Dyne's funeral), substituted Miss Dyne for her father.

A will of the 22d of February, 1813, Mrs. Lockhart 500l. stock, Davis 500l., Wilson and Mrs. Wilson—her servants—100l. each, if in service; Harris 200l. per annum; Dyne—sole executor, residuary legatee, and devisee.

A will of the 24th of April, 1810, Mrs. Lockhart 1000l. after her father's death, Mrs. Brocklesby 500l. do., Mr. Gideon Fournier, her father, universal devisee and legatee for life, and Dyne sole executor and substituted residuary devisee and legatee.

A will of the 6th of September, 1809, Mrs. Lockhart 500l. after her father's death: her father universal devisee and legatee for life; and Humphry, her attorney, and Davis, joint executors and substituted residuary devisees and legatees.

* The wills of March 29, 1820, and of September, 1816, were of the deceased's writing: and both as to the style of expression, and form of the clause of attestation, coincided with A: the former, like A, was signed, but not attested: the other was signed and attested. The other executed wills were not in the deceased's writing, but they were formally drawn up and executed; and did not refer, but the will of 1817 and its draft did refer, to her connexion with the Newton family, and to her burial at Grantham.

Letter No. 1, 4th March, 1830.—Mrs. Morice's respects to Mr. Jackson, much obliged to him for the milk, but as he is so short of milk and eggs, she will not trouble him for more at present, but she longs for the jar of new honey he promised her a fortnight ago. She is as bad as she can be to be alive: but if he can call early on Friday morning, as she has received so many favours, she requests him to accept of a legacy of one thousand pounds of money after my decease, and the pictures. Come early, I wish much to see you. MORICE.

(Addressed) John Jackson, Esq.

No 2.—Mrs. Morice Best Respects to Mr. Jackson and begs his acceptance of the enclosed for past favors.

 The note (on stamp) enclosed was as follows:—

1000l. Gainsford Street London March 1830.

On demand I promise to pay Mr. John Jackson one thousand pounds For value Reced—after my decease. Mrs. E. MORICE.

to Mrs. E. Morice (Endorsed) JOHN JACKSON.

Gainsford Street Horslydown.

A deed, executed by the deceased, of the 24th of May, 1813, transferred to Aldridge and another as trustees 1000l. bank stock, and 13,000l. five per cent. to pay the interest to her for life, and on her death the principal to Dyne, if he survived her; if not, the interest to Mrs. Dyne for life, and after her death the principal to her daughter.

The deed recited that "a friendly intercourse had long subsisted between the deceased and Dyne, during which period he had rendered such important services as had in a great measure secured the fortune and promoted the happiness and comfort of Mrs. Morice, who had not any relations then living, but such as were of a very distant degree."

The wills in favour of Dyne contained nearly the same recital.

gave it—secondly it is my wish and desire to be kept one month in my Frunt parlor Thirdly tis my wish and desire to be buried by no one but Mr Thomas Burton in the church at Grantham in Lincolnshire with Doctor Newton's family Relict of Sir Isick Newton Fourthly I give to Francis Daniel Esq of Grove Cottage Mile End Green the sum of Two thousand pounds and I also give to Batsford Esq of Horslydown two thousand pounds—and I also give to Mr Thomas Burton one thousand pounds—I also give to Mr Brickenden Surgeon the sum of one thousand pounds I also give to Mr Daniel Harice an officer at Union Hall three thousand and then to his wife after his death—Next I give to my present servants Sarah Cook John Sutton and his present wife if liveing with me at my Death one hundred pounds each for mourning to be paid them within one month and I also give them one hundred each a year for there life and to continue in my house as long as they live Furnished as it is now and all the taxes to be paid by my executors [579] with all my common close to be divided between Sarah Cook and Mrs Sutton my best close to Mrs Harris I also give to Ann Rowland Daniel of Mile End Green five thousand pounds with my plate and Dimonds. And I also hearby constitute and nominate and appoint the said Francis Daniel Esq and the said Batsford Esq executors to this my last will and testament Hereby revoke all former wills made by me at any time and declare this to be my last will and testament of me Elizabeth Morice April 25 1820 Signed sealed published and declared by me the said Elizabeth Morice as and for herself will and testament in the presents of us who in her presents and at her request and in the presents of each other subscribe our names as witnesses Elizabeth Morice in a former will I left a Mr. Aldridge Five thousand pounds and his Wife two for her own use but now I exclude them both Haveing amply provided for them both in my lifetime all my legacys to be paid within three months after my death

Mr Thomas Burton is to be paid all my funeral expences and to have the one thousand pounds clear of any duty whatever and all the rest which I have to left any thing to one thousand pounds to St Johns Charity School My fathers grave at Saint Johns to be kept in Repair and to be painted every year—and a monument is to be put up for me in the church of Grantham Lincolnshire and one thousand pounds to Mr John Davice of Paradise Row Rotherhithe and after his death to be devided between is two sisters Mrs Anderson and Mrs Colson

B—In Batsford's writing.

[580] Sutton and his wife to be allowed to live in the house free of rent and taxes till their death

Mr. Daniel's legacy to be £5000 instead of two. [This was interlined.]

The annies to the servants to be paid to them for their life only after their decease the stock to be divided bet· the residuary legatees

The pictures to be divided bet· the executors

The furniture to be divided bet· the 3 servants at the discretion of the exors

The division of the cloaths to be at the discretion of the exors.

A pair of diamond ear rings to Mrs Batsford—the rest of the jewellery of all descriptions and the plate to Ann Rowland Daniel—except as follows

The silver tankard formerly belonging to Sir Isaac Newton to Mr Batsford

The interest of £50 4 per cents to be applied in keeping Mr Fourniers monument in repair and in painting the same once a year

Residuary legatees to be the two executors (a)

C—In deceased's writing, and superscribed

Charles Batsford Esq May 7 1820

"Mrs Morices respects to Mr Batsford, Saying they had both forgot Mr Truscotts bill which was taken up of 23 : 19 : 11 therefore he cannot owe her Much if Mrs Batsford Will not be offended you May put down in the Will that money Which I have in the bank Stock in my Name for herself for Pocket Money for her."

D—A draft will of 1820 settled by counsel

[581] E—In the deceased's writing, except the part in brackets, which was interlined.

"I appoint Mr Henry Whealer [Hercules Court Threadneedle Street] stock broker

---

(a) On the back of this paper were calculations in Batsford's writing of the amount of legacies in A, of the deceased's money in the funds, and of her bank stock.

of Surry Square Kent Road my executor with Charles Batsford Esq (a) Mr Daniel Harris five thousand pounds (b) at his death to his wife and at her death to be devided between his two sons Daniel and William 'Harris—to Mr. Sutton two thousand pounds at his death to his Wife and at her Death to her Daughter Ann Cook if living with me (c)

This legacy was struck through.

to Charles Batsford Esq my house and all that is in it"

F—In the deceased's writing, and superscribed

"Charles Batsford Esq" June 24 1822

"Mrs Morices respects to Mr Batsford and as he will Nott Sett himself down More than the other executor She desires and begs he Will Sett Mrs Batsford down Five thousand pounds for her own use and Two thousand pounds for Each of his Daughters—he May only mention Mr Harris for if he Dies before Mrs Morice then She Can mention Mrs Harris in a Codicil to her Will"

G—Draft will of 1822—in Batsford's writing.

H—Copy (in Batsford's writing) of will of 1822, delivered to Wheeler.

I—Abstract of legacies in deceased's writing :—

"Henry Wheeler Ten Thousand pounds to [582] Charles Batsford Ten Thousand pounds to Susanner Batsford the wife of the said Charles Batsford Five thousand pounds to Susannah Batsford and Fanny Batsford the two Daughters of Charles Batsford two thousand pounds to Thomas Brickenden one thousand pounds to Thomas Burton one thousand pounds to Daniel Harris Police Officer five thousand pounds to John Sutton my servent two thousand pounds provided he shall be in my Service at the time of my Deceise to John Davis of Rotherhithe one thousand pounds to the Treasurers of the time being of Saint Johns Female Charity School at Horslydown one thousand pounds to John Woolley of Gainsford St. Butcher and James Watts of Gainsford St. Cheesemonger Five hundred pounds each."

The will of 2d July, 1822, gave the pecuniary legacies as paper I. In addition it gave to Mr. Batsford her dwelling house with every thing in it: to Mrs. Batsford her jewels and 600l. bank stock; to the churchwardens of St. John's, Southwark, 5l. per annum, to keep in repair and paint annually her father's monument. It appointed Wheeler and Batsford executors and residuary legatees. It contained the same directions as to her burial, funeral, &c. as paper A.

Lushington and Dodson in support of the will.

The King's advocate and Nicholl contrà.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. Elizabeth Morice, widow, died on the 10th of March, 1830, at the age of 65 years, at her residence in Horsleydown, leaving personalty of the [583] value of 70,000l. Thomas Alderson and his two married sisters, the deceased's second cousins, were her nearest relations.

Her will, propounded by the executors and residuary legatees, and opposed by one of the next of kin, is dated on the 2d of July, 1822, nearly eight years before her death, and gives various legacies; among others, 10,000l. to each of the executors, 5000l. to Mrs. Batsford, 2000l. each to the two Misses Batsford, several considerable sums to her friends and tradesmen, and the residue jointly to the executors. At the time the will was executed the residue did not exceed 1000l. or 2000l., but the property afterwards greatly increased. The will is in the handwriting of Batsford, the deceased's solicitor at the time it was made, and is attested by two witnesses, neighbours of the solicitor, casually called in; they were not privy to the instructions, preparation, or reading over, but merely saw the deceased subscribe, and had no reason to doubt her capacity.

Under such circumstances the advisers of the executors, thinking it necessary to plead more than the mere factum, have in the allegation propounding the will referred back to a will made in 1820, to instructions in her own handwriting for that will, to alterations made by her in 1822, and to various other documents also in her handwriting. On this first plea were examined the two attesting witnesses, and one other witness who speaks to the finding of paper I, one of these documents. The handwriting was admitted in acts of Court.

(a) Ten thousand pounds to C. B. and H. Wheeler.

(b) Instead of the three given him in the will to the trustees.

(c) Two thousand pounds to John Sutton.

These memoranda were written by Batsford on the fly-leaf of E, opposite to the corresponding clauses.

On the part of Alderson a long allegation sets up, first, a case of weak capacity, and secondly, insanity: on the first head, suggesting fraud and [584] imposition, and, on the other, legal incapacity. The second article contains the general description of the deceased—"That she was from her youth a person of weak capacity and of deranged mind and intellect; that the general wildness of her countenance and the expression thereof, and her general appearance, manners, conduct, and deportment, were such as to denote that she was a person of weak and deranged mind and intellect; and as such and as an insane or crazy person, and as one who did not know what she was about, and was not in her right senses, and as incapable of doing any act requiring thought, judgment, and reflection, she was at all times considered and spoken of and treated by medical men and by her family, relations, friends, and acquaintance, and that she was frequently called 'mad Miss Fournier,' 'mad Mrs. Morice,' or 'mad mother Morice.'"

The twelve following articles proceed to describe her general habits (at all periods —from her earliest life to the day of her death) of extravagance and irrationality in her mode of dress, in her immodest behaviour, in her profaneness, in carrying loaded pistols, in playing with toys, in fondness for her cat, in exposing her person, in continual intoxication, and in various other acts which it is impossible to enumerate without reading the whole of this part of the allegation.(a)[1] Of these acts, no particular time or place are specified; they are laid as occurring at all times and during her whole life. It was impossible therefore to negative, contradict, or explain any individual acts.

[585] The allegation then pleaded some specific acts; that at her own marriage in 1795 she conducted herself as an insane person; that at the marriage of her servant, Mitchell, her behaviour was irrational; that in 1816 she offered marriage to a low man—Knoller; that for some years she associated in a strange manner with a Dr. Daniel and his daughter; that in 1823, having broken her arm, she was guilty of some violent and irrational conduct; and it also pleaded one or two acts subsequent to the execution of the will: and the 27th article averred that she was subject to various delusions, which it specified.(a)[2] The plea further alleged that in respect to the documents in her handwriting, they were written either from dictation or from drafts which she was made to copy; and as an instance of this an exhibit, No. 5, is annexed, and is pleaded to have been written by Batsford, as a draft from which the deceased might copy a legacy to her servant named Sutton. So that the deceased was not only insane, but the will was obtained by fraud; and no inference of her capacity is to be drawn from these documents, which were mere contrivances to give colour and effect to the fraud. On this allegation no less than sixty-nine witnesses have been examined.

In reply it was pleaded that the deceased throughout her life was sane, was treated by her family and friends as sane, was in the uncontrolled management of her property, and in such manage-[586]-ment displayed judgment and prudence; that at various periods of her life she was engaged in acts of business which she conducted without the suspicion of derangement: the plea also alleged facts to shew the probability of the disposition in respect to the legatees; and explained some of the specific acts, and exhibited a number of her letters written at different periods. In support of this allegation thirty-four witnesses have been examined.

This being the shape and substance of the case, it will be necessary to inquire:

First, whether there is satisfactory proof that the will contained the mind and intention of the deceased at the time it was executed.

Secondly, whether that mind was sane or insane, capable or incapable of giving effect to such a will.

The deceased on the morning of the execution being at Mr. Batsford's office, the

---

(a)[1] The 13th pleaded, and it was proved, that on the floor of one of her drawing-rooms there were at her death fifty-two bushels of coals, which she had from time to time carried there herself.

(a)[2] That she believed imps were dancing about her; that her cat, Mungo, had been poisoned; that she had poisoned her husband; that Dyne and others had attempted to poison her; that she was afraid of being carried off; and that in June, 1822, she pointed out a small hole in the wainscoat, by which she declared thieves had entered and stolen all her wine.

latter called in Mr. Greenwood, a surgeon, and Hughes, his shopman, who lived close by. On their arrival the deceased subscribed and they attested the will: they believe the deceased was of sound mind; they saw nothing to excite suspicion, or to impeach her capacity or sanity. The transaction happened eight years before their examination: they have no recollection that the will was read over in their presence; nor is it very probable that such was the fact: they know nothing of its preparation nor of the instructions for preparing it. The whole effect of their evidence is that the execution passed as a mere ordinary transaction of business: if, on the one hand, there was nothing to probe the mind of the deceased, nothing to ascertain how far it went with the act, and was free from any imposition or delusion, so [587] neither, on the other hand, was there any appearance to excite their suspicion either of fraud or insanity.

In a case of perfectly sound mind, and free from any suspicion of imposition, this evidence of bare execution would be sufficient: the law would infer the rest: it would infer that the contents were known and approved, and that the party intended to give them effect. Neither fraud nor the absence of sound mind is to be presumed: but in this case there are circumstances which excite the jealousy and awaken the vigilance of the Court—which demand something more than proof of a bare execution. The will was prepared by, and is in the handwriting of, Mr. Batsford: he was the solicitor of the deceased; she was alone at his office; he takes a very important benefit; he is joint executor; joint residuary legatee; there are large legacies to himself and to his family: there were therefore inducements to take advantage either of a weak mind or of an insane mind, and to abuse confidence.(a) The Court would therefore look for evidence that the deceased knew and approved the contents, before it entered more particularly upon the question of sanity. That evidence may, however, be fully supplied by the documents in her own handwriting —for that they are her handwriting is admitted. [588] An attempt, indeed, and considering the number and nature of the scripts, rather a strange and desperate attempt, has been made to shew that these documents did not come spontaneously from the deceased; but were either copied by her from drafts or written by her under dictation; and to establish that averment an exhibit (No. 5)—found in the possession of the deceased, or at least among her papers—is annexed to Mr. Alderson's allegation. "To my servant, John Sutton, the legacy or sum of 2000l., provided he shall be in my service at my decease."

This paper is averred to be in Batsford's handwriting: on the other side, however, it had in the first plea been alleged that the deceased in 1823 delivered to Wheeler, the other executor, a copy of the will, which (script H) was brought in by Mr. Wheeler, annexed to his affidavit of scripts, before Alderson's plea was given: and in the executors' second allegation it was further stated that, on Sutton's leaving the deceased's service in 1824, Wheeler, by desire of the deceased, sent her a copy of the clause containing Sutton's legacy; that No. 5 was such copy and was in Wheeler's handwriting. Which account is true? The answer to this question will furnish a test by which to try the charge of imposition. There is not a tittle of evidence that the exhibit was prepared as Alderson's plea avers: but the averment is falsified; it is proved that No. 5 is not Batsford's, but that it is Wheeler's writing. Mary Morrill, the first witness on the condidit, proves that, immediately upon the deceased's death, Wheeler produced a copy of the will. Sutton too, it is proved, left the deceased's service in 1824: but what is almost conclusive of the truth [589] of the executors' account is that this exhibit is a verbatim transcript of the clause in the will, and is not a verbatim transcript of any document in the deceased's handwriting. This disproves Alderson's averment that it was a draft given to the deceased from which to copy the abstract, paper I; and goes far to confirm the truth of the averment (and that averment is not unimportant) that the deceased had been in possession of, and had delivered a copy of, the will to Wheeler in 1823: and also that she obtained this transcript from him in the manner alleged: otherwise, how could this transcript in Wheeler's handwriting have been found in the repositories of the deceased; and he be in possession of the copy of the will? This tends strongly to negative any practice of fraud and imposition, and to establish that a copy of the will was really left in the deceased's custody; which copy she afterwards delivered to Wheeler. That fact is further confirmed by the abstract of the legacies in her own handwriting (to which I shall presently advert); for unless she had for a time the copy of the will in her possession, how could she make that abstract?

(a) "Where a deed is prepared by the person himself who seeks the benefit of it, without the intervention of any other person, that circumstance alone is sufficient to raise a suspicion of fraud: and the instrument is to be viewed with the greatest jealousy, because the person with whom he deals is thus deprived of the opportunity of any disinterested testimony on the subject, and for this reason instruments obtained by attorneys from their clients are always viewed with extraordinary jealousy." Per Lord Redesdale, 2 Sch. and Lef. 502-3.

Previous to a more particular notice of that abstract, I will examine what other documents there are to shew that this will was the act and intention of the deceased.

The plea lays, as the origin and substratum of the present will, that the deceased in 1820 executed a will giving legacies to Batsford and also to Daniel, and appointing them joint executors and residuary legatees, and also giving several legacies to the same persons as are benefited by the present will: that in 1822 she departed from that disposition; and excluding Daniel and adopt-[590]-ing Wheeler executed the present and destroyed the former will. It is unnecessary to detail all the other particulars of the transaction alleged in the executors' first plea.

The papers in the deceased's handwriting, and so admitted to be, are—first, those which relate to the will of 1820. Paper A, a sort of draft will dated 25th April, 1820, with subsequent additions in the deceased's handwriting, was the paper of instructions taken to Mr. Batsford wherefrom to prepare the will in question. The deceased had executed several former wills at different times: though this paper contains no express bequest of the residue, looking to her other acts, no doubt she intended it for her executors.

The next paper, B, is in the handwriting of Batsford, it contains further instructions; and both at the beginning and at the end of it mention is made of the residue. The exact day when the instructions were given does not appear: it was probably early in May, for though A is dated on the 25th of April, yet the deceased made several additions after the date was inserted. The probability then is that it was not carried to Batsford till the beginning of May, more especially as the next document, C, bears date on the 7th of May. C is in the deceased's handwriting. It refers to a matter of account with Truscott, against whom Batsford at that time was employed to take legal proceedings on her behalf, and it further offers to Mrs. Batsford, as a small honorary legacy, some bank stock, of which it appears the deceased was possessed. D is the draft will of 1820, prepared after C was written: the only material observation that arises on it is that it was laid before an eminent counsel in the Temple, whose endorsement [591] of approval is dated on the 11th of May, 1820; evidence to some extent that the deceased was not imposed upon by Batsford, and that there was no fraudulent contrivance, for there was no clandestinity nor extraordinary haste. The executed will is not produced, but that would naturally be destroyed when the new will in 1822 was made; and it is alleged that such was the fact.

Such in 1820 were the deceased's mind and intention. Daniel and his daughter were not at that time discarded, though the deceased, having become acquainted with Batsford as her professional man in 1819, adopted him in the will of 1820 as a partaker in her bounty. It is not necessary to inquire whether the deceased was wise or capricious or hasty in this change of disposition, though, looking at her history, it is difficult to say that it was unwise or irrational, or unnatural or improbable; but it is sufficient at present to shew that it was the act and mind of the deceased; and there is nothing in these papers in her handwriting to satisfy me that either imposition or insanity taints the will of 1820.

In 1822 the deceased proceeds to make the will propounded, by which the Daniels are altogether discarded and Wheeler is adopted as the object of her bounty in conjunction with Batsford. The other legatees, all old friends, are nearly the same: but, in addition, two tradesmen—her butcher and cheesemonger—are given legacies.

Between 1820 and 1822 it would seem that the deceased had grounds for excluding the Daniels: they had borrowed money of her and could not repay it—at least the father could not: the deceased had only obtained his note of hand, and had had recourse to legal measures in order to re-[592]-cover the debt. Considering her history with the Daniels (to which I shall hereafter advert) it is not surprising that she should have discovered their views: the fact, however, that she broke off all connection with them is rather a mark of her sanity and her strength of mind. Nevertheless she did not transfer the whole benefit to Mr. Batsford: she introduced as the participator in her testamentary bounty her stock-broker, Mr. Wheeler, who with his brother, as well as his father before them, had been employed for many years in managing her property; so far at least as to invest what she did not want: for she always went to the bank and received her own dividends.

There is no reason to suppose that Batsford suggested this substitution of Mr. Wheeler for Daniel; they were not acquainted with each other, nor is there any trace of a conspiracy between them: but Mr. Batsford appears to have acted fairly and liberally in declining to take a larger legacy than his co-executor and co-residuary legatee; and that Mr. Batsford's family take in addition large legacies is the deceased's own act.

This brings me to the documentary evidence relating to the transaction of the will propounded. It begins with paper E. [The Court here read E.]

The new disposition, then, and the new executor come from the deceased herself. The legacy to Harris is increased from 3000l. to 5000l., and Batsford takes an increased benefit—"the house and all that is in it." On the back, in the handwriting of Batsford, is "10,000l. to C. B. and H. Wheeler." There is no proof of the instructions for this clause or how it came to be inserted, except as it is explained in the next paper, F. That paper, in the deceased's handwriting, and [593] dated 24th June, 1822, is a very important document. It affords full evidence of mind and intention: she assigns her reasons and is not to be diverted from her purpose: she also assigns reasons in respect to the bequest to Harris, shewing that she fully understood the nature of a testamentary act, and the safest mode of carrying her wishes into effect.

These papers not only repel any appearance of fraud and circumvention practised on an understanding too weak to resist,(a) but they furnish [594] such proof of sound

---

(a) In Bates v. Graves, 2 Ves. jun. 288, Lord Chancellor Loughborough says: "The issue devisavit vel non always implies in it, where the execution is not the point of the issue, a question of the capacity of the testator; that is, either his absolute capacity, or his relative capacity, where it is supposed the particular instrument was the effect of that undue influence, which necessarily implies a degree of weakness at the time, and quoad that instrument, making it not an instrument arising from the fair bias of his own mind, but from the exercise of that improper influence." See the case passim, particularly pp. 289, 292-3.

In the Treatise of Equity, 5th ed., by Fonblanque, vol. i. p. 68, et seq., is this passage: "Although there is no direct proof that a man is non compos, or delirious, yet if he is of a weak understanding and is harassed and uneasy at the time; or if the deed be executed in extremis; or by a paralytic; it cannot be supposed he had a mind adequate to the business he was about, and might more easily be imposed upon (Filmer v. Gott, 7 Bro. P. C. 70. Fane v. Duke of Devonshire, 6 Bro. P. C. 137); especially the provision in the deed being something extraordinary, or the conveyance without any consideration.. And the rule of the common law itself, in case of wills, is very favourable; although it can hardly perhaps be extended to deeds without circumstances of fraud or imposition. For a memory which the law holds there to be a sound memory is, when the testator hath understanding to dispose of his estate with judgment and discretion, which is to be collected from his words, actions, and behaviour at the time, and not from his giving a plain answer to a common question." (Marquis of Winchester's case, 6 Rep. 23.)

Mr. Fonblanque, in a note on the earlier part of this extract, says: "In James v. Graves, 2 P. Wms. 270, Lord Commissioner Jekyll seems to lay some stress upon the circumstance of a deed not being revocable as a will, and therefore liable to be set aside, if gained from a weak man by misrepresentation, and without any valuable consideration. But it appears from the case of Fane v. Duke of Devonshire that though a deed obtained in extremis, and by imposition, do contain a clause of revocation, the principles upon which courts of equity proceed will equally attach and entitle the party prejudiced to be relieved against it." In Fane's case, however (see 6 Bro. P. C. 140), one at least of these revocable deeds (for there were two of the same date) was not to operate during the life of the grantor: and would therefore seem to stand exactly on the same grounds as a will—except as to the Court in which relief was to be sought.

mind that nothing short of decisive, disqualifying insanity could defeat the testamentary effect of a disposition proceeding from such a mind and intention.

If more were necessary, there is still another paper in her own handwriting of no inconsiderable importance, Paper I, the abstract of the pecuniary legacies made by the deceased herself. It is quite correct, and exact in order and amount. It is alleged by Alderson that the deceased was not in possession of the will after she had executed it: but H, the duplicate produced by Wheeler, the latter asserts on oath was delivered to him by the deceased in 1823, and No. 5, in Wheeler's handwriting, was found in the deceased's possession—in her pocket book—at her death. How the deceased could have made the abstract I, except by having H in her possession as alleged by Batsford, no explanation has been attempted in plea or argument. The strong presumption and probability are that it was an abstract taken from the will or copy: but be that as it may, the very circumstance of the deceased making the abstract, whenever made and however abstracted, [595] is strong proof of mind, memory, and understanding; that she fully knew the contents of the will and perfectly approved of the disposition thereby made. It is true that neither this abstract nor any other paper in the deceased's handwriting expressly makes a disposition of the residue, but I cannot entertain the slightest doubt that she fully intended the executors to have it, and it is given to the executors in some of the former wills.

The legacies themselves strongly tend to shew that the will was the deceased's own act; and that neither were these legacies introduced to give colour to the main disposition: nor did the deceased fluctuate in regard to them. She had, as I have said, reason from the conduct of the Daniels to alter the disposition of 1820 in their favour—but she had none to depart from her intentions of benefiting the legatees. Brickenden had been her medical attendant many years, and had recently (1819) retired from business and removed out of the neighbourhood. Burton was an old acquaintance, a builder and carpenter; and she had always intended that he should bury her. There are letters from the deceased to him written both before and after the will, which not only render the legacy to him probable, but which shew that the deceased was not a person of that habitual and uniform incapacity mentioned in Alderson's plea. I will read one of these letters:—

March 4, 1820

Dear Sir,—I wrote you in my last I was going to Mile End for a few days but have been prevented by Truscotts business Mr Batsford can do nothing without seeing you be so kind to see him on Monday he wants to ask you many questions and tell him all you know on the business I find Sir William Abdy [596] must have a fine of six pounds in the first place and the stamps will be high and Truscott has gone from his word about paying all above ten pounds which was the Bargon My Lawyear thinks I can turn Truscott out I wish I could. Call on me when you have seen Mr Batsford you will oblige me by asking Mr Batsford what the expences will amount to all together that I may know what I am about—tell him what you told me that Sir William Abdy you thought need not be consulted—from your sincere friend

MORICE

I shall see you on Monday evening

(Superscribed) Mr Burton Flint Street Wallworth.

This letter, on a matter of business just before the will of 1820, is as rational as possible, and it is proved by other evidence that at that time a lawsuit was pending between the deceased and Truscott. It is impossible to say that the writer of this letter was not then competent. There is another letter, also to Burton, about eight months after the date of the will propounded. It is in these words:—

February 6, 1823

Dear Sir,—Pardon my long silence in not thanking you for your kind present of the birds. I have not been able to put pen to paper before this day. I have kept my bed room almost ever since I came from the North which was on the 2^{d} of November. I am happy to know where you live and hope you will always inform me as I hope no one will bury me when I am dead but you it was you know always my wish and I have left you handsome besides. Since I saw you I have had nothing but illness and did not think I should have lived till now I often have talked to Mr Batsford of Horse-[597]-lydown Lane about you When I am better and get down stairs I shall be glad to see you I conclude with wishing you health from your sincere friend MORICE (Superscribed) Mr Thomas Burton No 34 Edmond Street Southampton Street Camberwell.

This is an express recognition of the will in which she not only directs that Burton shall bury her, but also gives him 1000l. and desires that it shall be independent of the expence of her funeral. It shews too her intercourse with and confidence in Batsford. It is impossible to conceive a more rational, quiet, letter; it recognizes the will and contains nothing sounding to folly: yet Alderson's case is, and his witnesses attempt to support it, that this woman was at all times insane. Harris (a police officer appointed by her father, who was a police magistrate) and his wife kept up a continued intimacy with the deceased, and occasionally transacted matters of business for her. Letters to Harris and his wife of the same tendency as those to Burton are exhibited. Sutton lived eleven years in her service, he and his two wives in succession; the wives as servants on board wages; Sutton himself as a sort of guard and protector: but as they might quit her service, as Sutton in fact did in 1824, she made his legacy conditional, "in case he should be in her service at her death." Mr. Davis was a very old and confidential friend of the family; he used to call on the deceased every Monday to receive her directions as to any business she might wish him to transact for her. All these legacies were in the will of 1820; she was quite steady in respect to them—in 1822 she adds legacies to two of her tradesmen, both persons she had long dealt with [598] and who were attentive in supplying her. The legacy to St. John's School, though it is pleaded that the deceased never gave away any money in charity, was not colourably suggested by Batsford; for it appears in both wills—it is in the deceased's handwriting in A, and the evidence of one of the witnesses, who applied to the deceased to subscribe to the school in her lifetime, proves that she declined so to do, at the same time declaring she would not forget the school at her death. The whole disposition then strongly confirms the presumption of law that the act emanated from the testatrix, and further, that it was the emanation of a rational mind.

It will be necessary, however, to examine with more minuteness into the latter fact—her sanity; for though in considering the evidence, in order to see whether the factum of the will and her knowledge and approbation of the contents were proved, I have not altogether omitted noticing some of the circumstances which also bear upon the question of sanity, yet the Court is not warranted in concluding at once that there exists no possibility of proving insanity: but it must be proved: the rule of law being well established that sanity is presumed till insanity be proved. The burthen of proof lies upon the party who undertakes, upon that ground, to defeat an instrument—be it will or be it deed.

It may be difficult and perhaps would be dangerous to attempt to define what is the essence of insanity. Delusion has been generally laid down as essential: that is, the fancying things to exist which can have no existence, and which fancy no proof or reasoning will remove. Others may have said that insanity may exist though no delusion pre-[599]-vail: whether this means that it may exist where no delusion ever has prevailed, or only where you cannot call it forth upon the particular occasion, is not so clear. No case has ever come under my notice where insanity has been held to be established without any delusion ever having prevailed, nor am I able exactly to understand what is meant by "a lucid interval," if it does not take place when no symptom of delusion can be called forth at the time. How, but by the manifestation of the delusion, is the insanity proved to exist at any one time? The disorder may not be permanently and altogether eradicated—it may only intermit—it may be liable to return; but if the mind is apparently rational upon all subjects, and no symptom of delusion can be called forth on any subject, the disorder is for that time absent; there is then an interval, if there be any such thing as a lucid interval. It may often be difficult to prove a lucid interval, because it is difficult to ascertain the total absence of all delusion.

Where clear, decided, and undoubted insanity has been established to have once existed before the contested transaction, acts otherwise of a doubtful character may become of more force in proof of its existence at the time in question. Even acts decidedly of an insane character occurring after the transaction may reflect back upon acts, otherwise equivocal, about the time of the transaction itself, or on the general deportment of the party: but where there are no decided acts proved ever to have taken place; when all the acts are equivocal; when they may be attributed to other causes, to violent passion, to intoxication operating upon a mind naturally excitable, I am not aware that in any case such equivocal acts, [600] however numerous, have been held to establish insanity.

The sort of case set up in this suit has been already in some degree described. Before adverting to the nature of the evidence adduced in support of it, I will briefly refer to the history and character of the deceased.

The deceased was born about the year 1765. She was the daughter and only child of Gideon Fournier, a police magistrate at Union Hall, who resided many years in Gainsford Street, Horsleydown, where the deceased died. The character of the neighbourhood of that part of the town is pretty well known. Her mother was fond of dress, and neither father nor mother seems to have been very severe in their restraint of the daughter: she was a girl of rather a truant disposition; she liked to go to tea-gardens and such places of public amusement, and was not much controuled by her parents; nor was Horsleydown likely to produce society calculated to engage a young girl of strong feelings in a circle of mere domestic visits. In 1795 the deceased, then of the age of thirty, having about three years before declined the offer of a Mr. Bryant, was married to Morice—he was engaged as a clerk in a brewery; and though at first the connection appears to have obtained the sanction of the father, yet his consent having been subsequently withdrawn, the marriage was clandestine. A reconciliation, however, shortly afterwards took place, and the deceased and her husband went to reside next door to her parents. In 1805 Morice died; and the deceased in this cause from that time continued a widow. In 1812 the father (then a widower, for his wife died a year or two before) died; and after his death the [601] deceased threw his house and her own into one, and continued ever afterwards to occupy both.

In 1808 the deceased had, under the will of her aunt, Mrs. Perrot, become possessed of certain property, some articles of which were in the hands of the Alderson family; she brought an action to recover that property, and obtained a verdict subject to a reference. In the course of that transaction the deceased made an affidavit, on account of which the Aldersons indicted her for perjury, and she was convicted. Upon the interposition of friends, particularly of a friend named Dyne, they were, with some difficulty, prevailed upon not to bring the deceased up for judgment: but this transaction produced such an alienation that no intercourse ever afterwards took place between the deceased and the Aldersons. It is not denied that it was highly improbable that if she made any will the Aldersons would be benefited. Any will made by the deceased in her senses would be adverse to the Aldersons—they stand not upon the deceased having any sane intention to benefit them, but upon their legal rights as next of kin, as they undoubtedly are entitled to do. They must, however, prove the deceased insane as they have alleged and undertaken to prove.

I have already said that the deceased was of a truant temper, of strong passions, and was never much controuled. It appears not merely by the depositions of witnesses, but by a memorandum-book in her own handwriting, that her mind was extremely vicious; her constitution highly lascivious and corrupt—not restrained by the modesty of her sex, nor brought into subjection by religious or moral principles. After the death of her parents, having a considerable property at her [602] own command and disposal—living at Horsleydown—nearly fifty years of age—having no near relations (for the Aldersons, her second cousins, were the nearest)—having no respectable society nor connexions—convicted of perjury—she gave way to her natural profligate propensities, and to the vices belonging to her passions, and among other things indulged in the frequent and excessive use of spirituous liquors.

The question then is whether she became actually insane in the legal and correct meaning of the term insanity; or whether she was only guilty of those extravagances of which a person of such a character and so excited would occasionally, or even frequently, be guilty. There is produced a cloud of witnesses—that is every witness examined on Alderson's plea—who give unhesitating opinions that the deceased was mad: but their opinions are of little weight. A drunken woman in the streets excited by spirituous liquors forgets the modesty of her sex, is guilty of every sort of extravagance, talks irrationally, is hooted and pursued and pulled about by boys, so that every person who sees her says, "She is a mad woman," or, "she must be either drunk or mad." There is hardly an act of which an insane person can be guilty which may not arise from intoxication. Intoxication is in truth temporary insanity (see Treatise on Equity, c. ii. s. 3, p. 67, 5th ed.): the brain is incapable of discharging its proper functions; there is temporary mania—but that species of derangement, when the exciting cause is removed, ceases; sobriety brings with it a return of reason.

Now the case set up is, that the deceased at all times and from her earliest life was deranged, was [603] of unsound mind. Is that the truth of the case? Notwithstanding there is this cloud of witnesses to opinion and to certain acts, is the case set up reconcileable even with the documents in the deceased's handwriting already referred to? It is proper to consider how these witnesses are got together. I have already stated that the plea lays that all the acts enumerated occurred throughout her whole life and at all times. At the head of the sixty-nine witnesses is Miss Daniel, who, after stating that she knew the deceased intimately from 1814 to 1822, thus deposes: "During the whole of my aquaintance with her she was unquestionably of unsound mind and deranged: in speaking of her capacity I should not merely call it weak and slender, but distorted and vicious; her countenance was generally if not always marked by an extraordinary wildness of expression, her manners, conduct, behaviour, and deportment were uniformly strange and eccentric—extremely so; and that indicated a deranged and unsound mind and intellect: they were such as to make me at all times and under all circumstances consider her as insane and crazy. I can safely and conscientiously say that I never for one single hour during my acquaintance with her believed that she knew what she was about or that she was in her right senses or capable of doing any act which required thought, judgment, or reflection. I considered her more than insane—a decided maniac: she was always treated and spoken of by every person with whom I ever saw her, or by whom I ever heard her spoken of, as an insane and mad woman, and as having been out of her senses: the servants used to call her 'mad Mrs. Morice,' they used to say, 'Here comes mad Mrs. Morice,' and I [604] have heard people in the streets point her out and call her 'mad mother Morice.'"

This is the general account given by this witness; and on subsequent articles in support of these opinions she deposes to a multitude of acts so profane, so filthy, so obscene, so disgusting—many of them taking place not only in her presence, but in that of the witness' own father also—that no general words can describe them, and the particulars of them are quite unfit to be stated. But what does the witness admit? That for seven years she, a young unmarried woman of 25 or 26 years of age, and her own father were the constant associates of this insane disgusting person, borrowing money of her, she, the witness, repaying her, her father acknowledging by note a debt of 1900*l.*, though now his daughter describes the deceased as so mad that she was incapable of any rational act. To describe the deposition of this witness is impossible, and if possible it would be unfit; it occupies sixty sides of paper. The Court forbears to express more strongly its opinion of her evidence. It seems highly probable that Mr. Alderson was induced to frame his allegation principally from the account he received from this woman.

I must next consider the course followed to get together the host of witnesses to prove this allegation. A room is taken at "The Ship in Distress"—a tavern at Horsleydown: there the witnesses attend and are entertained; they talk the matter over, a long bill is incurred, the landlord and landlady are two of the witnesses—Mr. Alderson goes there frequently, and carries his own claret there. How is the Court to estimate the degree of reliance to be placed on witnesses [605] so got together and so brought forward? In the next place, even if there was no such cause to deduct from the credit of the witnesses, still the very nature of the plea forms a considerable deduction—they are not brought to speak to specific facts fixed by time, place, and circumstances, but to transactions and conduct spread over many years and which they describe as if constant and continuous habits. The will is made eight years before her death. If the deceased had been seen a few times guilty of extravagances or indecencies in the streets, a witness would club them together in his mind without even meaning to depose untruly, and would describe the conduct as a constant and perpetual habit. It is only in this view that it is possible to reconcile the depositions of the witnesses not only with the adverse witnesses, but with the written exhibits. Many of the witnesses, from the tenor and tone of their depositions and from the inconsistency of their own conduct at the time with the account they now relate, convince me that they have given a very inflamed and exaggerated statement of the conduct of the deceased. Many others convince me that they have inferred and deduced a general habit from a few particular facts—some from merely conversing with each other on the conduct of the deceased. It is impracticable to wade through this mass of evidence so as to assign reasons applying to each particular witness or to the facts which he relates, and to select a few would hardly afford more satisfaction. I will only notice one or two; I will take for instance the second witness—whose evidence immediately follows that of Miss Daniel—John Sutton, who lived in the deceased's house for eleven years—from 1813 to 1824: his two wives [606] acting as her servants; his first wife died in her service, and on marrying again his second wife in like manner became her servant; she did not take alarm at the deceased for four years, for she remained there till 1824, two years after the will was made: Sutton says on the second article:

"I lived in Mrs. Morice's house near upon eleven years, I went there as nigh as I can guess in 1813 and quitted in 1824. I was no servant of hers, and never had any thing from her: my wives—both of them—were her housekeepers; and I was allowed to live in the house with them. When my first wife died Mrs. Morice told me to look out for a good honest woman, such as I could recommend to be her housekeeper, and a neighbour of mine, whom I had known twenty years, I married in 1820, and we were obliged to leave Mrs. Morice in 1824: the deceased was not a clever woman at all, and I believe she was deranged during the whole time I lived in her house; she was not a raving mad woman, but I can say that she was positively mad—not in her right senses for one single moment during the whole time I lived with her. I could tell such things of her as are scarcely to be believed: I always thought her a very strange looking woman, and I knew her by sight many years before I lived with her: it was not so much the wildness of her looks as her general appearance, her manners, her conduct (in doors and out, drunk and sober, and she was very much attached to liquor—but drunk or sober it was all one, she was always mad) were so strange that it was clear to any person who saw her that she was quite mad crazy: I always considered her a lunatic altogether, and treated her as one: my present wife was obliged to leave her [607] because she was quite afraid of her; and for that reason we left. She was spoken of as 'mad Morice' in the whole neighbourhood: the boys used to call after her 'mad Morice,' and no wonder, seeing that as she walked about in the streets she stopped and talked to fishwomen and prostitutes: they were the only fit company for her: no body respectable could have any thing to say to her."

Such is his inflamed and exaggerated account: but he is a disappointed witness, for he expected a legacy, and I quite agree with him that he tells such things of her as can scarcely be believed—it so happens that above twenty of Mrs. Morice's letters, written to Mr. and Mrs. Dyne during four years of this very period—from 1810 to 1816—are quite rational letters touching upon the ordinary topics which would naturally occur, and are quite irreconcileable with the account given by Sutton "that the deceased was at all times, drunk or sober, insane."

I have already said that it is in vain to select particular witnesses or to attempt to discuss each deposition. I am obliged to content myself with stating the impression left on my mind by the general result. The Court therefore can only declare generally that the evidence, so far as it is credible at all, does not in its judgment make out decided actual insanity; for no act is proved by credible witnesses which cannot be accounted for by the excitement of liquor. Even the acts which may have been produced by that excitement were not constant and habitual; those exhibits in her own handwriting, to which reference has been already made, shewing that at the times when they were written she was in a sound state of mind; and, [608] above all, no fixed and settled state of delusion is proved by which the Court is enabled to say that at any one time or on any one subject the deceased was actually and essentially insane, so as to be legally incapacitated from disposing of her property either in her life-time or after her death.

Unless, then, it could be shewn that at the particular time when the will was made the deceased was so excited by liquor, or so conducted herself in doing the particular act as to be legally disqualified at the moment from giving effect to such act, the case of the next of kin fails; (a) still more does their evidence fail to establish satisfactorily that the deceased was at all times, or generally, a person of unsound mind.

But when the Court looks further, and examines the evidence produced by the executors, it has still less difficulty in arriving at the same conclusion. The Court has before it the whole history of the deceased's life: her various acts respecting her property—her various testamentary acts—the manner in which she was considered and treated by her family and friends—the manner in which she conducted herself when away from Horsleydown—at the bank—on excursions into the country—with her tradesmen—all this corroborated by her correspondence at various periods of her life, and by an accurate private account in her own handwriting of the dividends she received during the very last year of her life. [609] In 1792 Mr. Bryant pays his addresses to her—he receives a polite answer from her father, not declining the offer because he disapproves of the connexion, not because his daughter is unfit to contract marriage, but because she is not willing to accept it—because Mr. Bryant is not his daughter's choice. In 1795 she marries Mr. Morice—they live together eight or nine years; and there is a letter from him, written while he was at Paris, in 1802, bearing every mark of being addressed to a wife who conducted herself with propriety, and signed "her loving and affectionate husband." Her uncle, Mr. Newton, and her aunt, Mrs. Perrot, leave her very considerable property, and she becomes their legal representative. If they had considered her insane they would surely have taken a different course for her protection. In 1809 her nearest relations, the Messrs. Alderson, indict her for perjury; no great proof that they thought her insane. She takes every precaution to guard against the consequences of conviction, by assigning over her property and making preparations for emigrating to America. She disposes of several parts of her real estate. Mr. Mason, a highly respectable witness, has frequent and long interviews with her upon different transactions of business at that time; he speaks to her perfect sanity; so that it is not merely the formal acts of business themselves, but her conduct, deportment, and understanding accompanying those acts to which he deposes. In 1809 she makes a will, giving her property to her father for life, and then to Davis and Humphries, her solicitor. This will was made with reference to the prosecution for perjury.

During that prosecution Mr. Dyne had ren-[610]-dered her very essential service; she consequently makes a will giving every thing to her father for life and then to the Dynes. She also secures to Dyne a considerable sum by transfer of stock, she was however to enjoy the income for life. This was just after the death of her father, who (it should have been mentioned) died intestate, and consequently he, a man of business, must have thought her competent to the management and enjoyment of his property. The will in favour of Dyne was adhered to till after his death in 1816. There are exhibited a number of letters to Mr. and Mrs. Dyne from 1810 to 1816 proving sanity and capacity beyond all dispute: the first is dated November 21, 1810, and is as follows:—

My D. Madam,—I am to thank you most kindly for the privations I have occasioned you by Mr. Dynes continual absence from his home on my concerns. Allow me to express my gratitude both to him and you for services the extent of which I cannot express, and to assure you both that I shall always keep in mind both your interests considering them as my own I have taken the liberty of sending trinkett by Mr. Dynes for your Harriott as a memorial of my friendship and wish her health to enjoy it, and which though intended for her I beg may be at your disposal till you think it proper time to give it. With my father's best compliments—I am very sincerely yours, ELIZABETH MORICE.

I am happy to say that by Mr. Dynes exertion I am now in possession of all my property.

(Superscribed) Mrs. Dyne, Ash, Farnham Surry.

This is just after she gets rid of the indictment [611] for perjury; and there are above twenty letters equally sane, written at intervals during a period of six years even till after his death. It is in vain to say that it was not wise to give so much to Dyne, that it was over-estimating his services, that it was a wasteful disposal of her property: she had been rescued from the effects of this indictment, from the supposed necessity of being an exile from her country, and her gratitude for that rescue absorbed her sense of all other services, and induced her to give the Dynes her whole property. Surely this offers no proof of insanity, nor raises any inference of fraud and imposition.

---

(a) In Cory v. Cory, 1 Ves. 19, Lord Hardwicke was of opinion that the drunkenness of one of the parties was not sufficient to set aside a reasonable agreement to settle disputes in a family, unless some unfair advantage were taken. But in Cole v. Robins, per Holt, Bull. N. P. p. 172, the defendant may give in evidence that they made him sign the bond when he was so drunk he did not know what he did.

About the time of Dyne's death, if Knoller and Walker are to be believed, the deceased indulged in a good deal of profligacy. Knoller had rescued her from an assault of her servant, Wilson: Wilson was turned away, and in the will of 1815 Knoller has a legacy of 100l.—not a very extravagant reward for the service he had rendered her.

Comparing the evidence of these two witnesses, no very great reliance can be placed on either: for though Walker has not been a frequenter of "The Ship in Distress," there are some circumstances relating to her conduct not quite reconcileable with the account she has given of the deceased. It is not of sufficient importance to discuss it minutely.

On the death of Dyne—on the very day of the funeral—the deceased makes a codicil giving every thing to his daughter, but for some reason, or by some representation made to her, she in a very short time made a will favourable to the Aldridges and Daniels. During the period that will was in force, viz. from 1816 to 1820, it is not improbable that the deceased was encouraged [612] in her vicious propensities, and that advantage was taken of her habit of intoxication. A more profligate course of conduct than was pursued by Dr. Daniel and his daughter, as related by Miss Daniel herself, cannot well be imagined: but at length the deceased became sensible of their views; she employed Batsford in some matters of business the latter end of 1819 and beginning of 1820; she then gave the Daniels a smaller benefit, and she soon after made the will in question discarding them altogether.

To that will made in 1822, and propounded in this cause, the deceased adhered down to her death, that is for eight years. If there were any trace that Mr. Batsford had been conducting himself towards the deceased, either in procuring this will or in inducing her to adhere to it, in the same manner that Ann Daniel describes that her father and herself acted towards the deceased for six or seven years, the Court would be warranted in imputing fraud and imposition to Mr. Batsford; but there is nothing of the sort: Mr. Batsford has no further intercourse with the deceased than became him and was necessary as her solicitor.

The deceased, from the execution of the will to her death, continues to conduct her own affairs; she goes to the bank and receives her dividends; and the clerks at the bank, and Mr. Wheeler, the brother of the executor, are examined, and give a full account of her conduct and behaviour, clearly evincing soundness of mind. It is hardly doing justice to the case to omit stating their evidence in detail, but I shall venture to forbear. It was her habit to make excursions into the country, either merely spending the day, or passing some [613] months during the summer, at different watering places or making tours. She might at setting off from, or returning to, Horsleydown, choose to make a display before her neighbours, and have four or even, on one occasion, six horses, and be finely dressed, and lean forward in her carriage to display herself; she was a vain woman, and she held her neighbours in great contempt and liked to make an exhibition before them: but that does not amount to insanity. The landlord at the Tiger's Head, at Southend, proves the manner of her coming to his house to spend the day, and that she conducted herself with great propriety: and this, not upon one occasion, but for several years together, and several times in each year. The period spoken to by this witness includes the time when the will was made. Again, a lady at Margate, who lets out lodgings, which the deceased occupied for a month, and would have occupied a second time had they not been previously engaged, states: "During a month in July or August, 1820, a lady had lodgings (a bedroom and parlour) in my house at Margate: I knew her to be the deceased; for she invited me to call upon her in Gainsford Street, spoke of Mr. Batsford, her attorney, of her mother's name being Newton, and of herself being a descendant of Sir Isaac Newton: she came first and looked at my lodgings, agreed on the terms for a month certain, and staid the exact time to a day: she came as a stranger, accompanied by her female servant. During that month I saw the deceased continually several times a day, and seldom a day passed that we did not spend an hour or two together: she would send for me to sit half an hour with her [614] after dinner; and we frequently walked together in the fields: she was a very conversable and pleasant companion, never conducted herself otherwise than rationally and sensibly, seemed a clever well-informed woman, always managed the housekeeping herself, marketed herself, and gave directions how she would have the things cooked; put down the expenses in a book, and at the end of the month came to me of her accord, said she had agreed with me for so much, and paid me the exact amount according to agreement. About six years ago (that is about 1824) she again came to Margate, drove to my house, and much wished to have my lodgings; but they were full, and she took another lodging: she staid there two or three weeks; she came for a month, but as she said she did not like her lodgings, she left before the time. During this period I saw a good deal of her; she would call in occasionally every two or three days for a few minutes' chat, and at other times would stop more than an hour with me: two or three times my daughter and I visited her at her lodgings; she always appeared a sensible woman, one that I should call a sharp woman, not to be deceived, and who looked after her own interest. On both her visits to Margate I had much conversation on different subjects with her, but I never knew her talk otherwise than perfectly rationally and sensibly, and she conducted herself like any other gentlewoman." As these visits were in 1820 and 1824 the witness was quite competent to speak to her capacity about the time of her will.

These are witnesses entirely aloof from all connection with the parties or the neighbourhood. [615] It was not necessary, and it might have been difficult, to produce much evidence of this description, because if the deceased conducted herself properly at inns and lodging-houses she would not be remembered and could not be identified. It is not denied that the deceased did almost every summer make excursions to different watering places and different parts of the country entirely under her own guidance and management, and if she had been insane, and on these occasions acted as Mr. Alderson's witnesses state she did act at Horsleydown, she might have been recollected; but Mr. Alderson has not produced any evidence of any conduct of that description at any of those places, except from a servant picked up at Horsleydown, and not alone entitled to implicit credit. There is no evidence that she omitted to pay her taxes or to receive her dividends. Here are a multitude of notes—above twenty—written by her after the will was made and to the last year of her life to different persons; yet no attempt has been made to shew a word "sounding to folly" in any of them, and here is her account in her own handwriting with entries of the dividends received by her during the last year of her life not denied to be perfectly correct.

With this body of evidence tending to corroborate the general sanity of the deceased; her testamentary acts, her correspondence at various times and with various persons, her transactions of business spoken to by Mason, by the bank clerks, and by these other witnesses, confirmed as they are by letters and exhibits, how is it possible that the deceased could be in that state of continual insane excitement imputed to her by Mr. [616] Alderson's witnesses? And, further, reverting to the evidence of the factum and to the scripts in her own handwriting, the will is in my judgment proved to be the act of a free and capable testatrix; and must be accordingly pronounced for.

Will established.

ANTROBUS AND ASHHURST v. LEGGATT. Prerogative Court, Trinity Term, 3rd Session, 1831.—A party entering a caveat, and alleging himself to be an executor in the last will of the deceased, without inserting the date, has a right to call for an affidavit of scripts, without swearing as to his belief that he is an executor in some paper left by the deceased: and semble, without being liable to costs.

Frederick Booth, by his will dated the 28th of March, 1831, appointed Sir Edmund Antrobus, Bart., and William Henry Ashhurst, Esq., executors: they prayed probate, when an appearance was given for Horatio Leggatt, Esq. (for whom a caveat had been entered), alleging him to be an executor named in the last will of the deceased, dated , with certain codicils. These papers were asserted to be in Mr. Ashhurst's possession. Both proctors were then assigned to exhibit proxies and affidavits as to scripts. Mr. Ashhurst and his co-executor alleging they had not possession nor knowledge of any testamentary paper, under which Leggatt was either executor or legatee, applied to the Court to direct him to exhibit an affidavit as to his belief that he was an executor in some testamentary paper left by the deceased, before an affidavit as to scripts was brought in by the executors.

Dodson and Addams for the executors. The original minute was informal, the date of the alleged will not being inserted; and if it had not [617] been for an assurance on the part of Mr. Leggatt as to the existence of a will in which he had an interest, the minute would not have been consented to.

The King's advocate contrà. The assignation is quite in the usual form, and there is no instance of the enforcement of it being overruled. The practice is uniform.

Per Curiam. Let the practice be followed.

By-Day.—The affidavits as to scripts were exchanged. No testamentary paper was annexed to Leggatt's affidavit, and it not appearing that he was either an executor or legatee, the Court was on this day moved to decree probate to pass, as prayed, and to condemn Leggatt in costs.

Per Curiam. The Court decreed probate; but gave no costs.

[618] BRAMWELL v. BRAMWELL. Consistory Court of Rochester, 26th January, 1831.—Sentence of separation by reason of adultery and cruelty pronounced on proof of undue familiarities, clandestine communication, with frequent opportunities of guilt, and concealed correspondence by letters denoting great ardour of passion, if not allusions to actual guilt (but no credible proof of a fact of adultery), united with great violence of conduct and language, and an attempted blow.—On a suit for restitution the defendant must be compelled to return, unless it be proved that the plaintiff's inherent right is forfeited; but semble, less strict proof of cruelty or adultery is necessary, in answer to such a suit, than where the party making these charges is the original complainant.—Condonation is a conditional forgiveness, on a full knowledge of all antecedent guilt.—Less cruelty is necessary to revive condoned adultery than to found an original suit.

[Discussed, Dempster v. Dempster, 1861, 2 Sw. & Tr. 438. Referred to, Bernstein v. Bernstein, [1893] P. 301.]

This was a suit for restitution of conjugal rights brought by the husband: the citation issued on the 5th of August, 1828, but was not served until the 10th of March, 1829. A libel in the usual form having been admitted, a defensive allegation, with exhibits, on the part of the wife, pleading adultery and cruelty, and praying a sentence of separation, was debated and admitted. A responsive allegation, setting up condonation, and exhibiting two letters from the wife, and also a second allegation on behalf of the wife, explanatory of the date of one of the letters annexed to the responsive allegation, were admitted without opposition.

The substance of these pleas, and the evidence in support of them, are detailed in the judgment.

The King's advocate and Haggard for the wife.

Addams for the husband.

Judgment—Dr. Lushington. This case involves several questions:—

I. Whether there is any proof of adultery.

II. If adultery be proved, whether it has been condoned.

[619] III. Whether, if condonation be proved, it applies to all the adultery preceding such condonation.

IV. If condonation be proved, whether the previous adultery has been revived by subsequent adultery.

V. Whether the cruelty proved be sufficient to found a sentence of divorce per se, or to revive former adultery.

It is to be remembered that the husband in this case commences the suit, praying that his wife may be compelled to return to cohabitation: and certainly he is entitled to the assistance of the Court, unless it can be shewn that he has forfeited the right originally inherent in him. Where the wife is acting on the defensive, she is not relieved from the proof of necessary facts, yet under such circumstances the inferences arising from facts when established may be stronger than where she is the original complainant; thus where a suit for the restitution of conjugal rights is promoted by the husband, the wife is not, according to the practice and doctrine of these Courts, held precisely to the same strictness of proof.

The general circumstances of this case are shortly these: marriage in 1806; birth of one child—a daughter: and cohabitation for nearly twenty-two years: that in 1809 Elizabeth Jeffery—then about eighteen years of age—came into Mr. and Mrs. Bramwell's service as nursery girl; in 1816 accompanied her mistress to Tunbridge Wells, where Mr. Bramwell was under medical advice in consequence of a wound in his face; in 1817 was placed at Tunbridge Wells in the care of a house till it could be let; and in 1821 was fixed in the Castle Inn at that place—part of the property at Tunbridge Wells to which Mr. Bramwell was en-[620]-titled in right of his wife, who was possessed of a considerable fortune. These are admitted facts: and it is not denied that an improper attachment had sprung up between Mr. Bramwell and Jeffery, nor that a clandestine correspondence, carried on between them, was detected by the wife in May, 1826; but it was correctly argued that the question still remained whether this attachment had ever been consummated by adultery. It may then be necessary to inquire whether adultery is proved in any particular instance: or whether, though the particular time and place cannot be fixed, there is sufficient to satisfy the mind of the Court that adultery has been committed.

I. The charges commence in 1816, when Mr. Bramwell was recovering from his wound. The proof of guilt at this time depends entirely on the credit of one witness; the circumstances to which he deposes are not in themselves altogether incredible; and the story receives some confirmation from the subsequent intimacy of these parties, which necessarily reflects back on conduct of an earlier date. Still, antecedent to the transaction of which this witness speaks no familiarity nor attention—nor any thing that can be regarded as the usual precursor of adultery—is established by distinct evidence, laying a foundation for this particular charge. The occasion when, as it is said, this act of adultery took place is not in my opinion very probable. Looking then to this absence of probability, to the interval of time that has elapsed, to the manner in which this witness has deposed, to his acknowledgment of a quarrel with Bramwell, and to his charge that Bramwell had ill used him, I come to this conclusion —that the evidence of this witness is, in the absence of all confirmation, much too questionable to be relied on, though I [621] do not go to the extent of imputing wilful perjury; he may, in words, have spoken truly, but in substance his evidence is such as I cannot reconcile with admitted facts. I therefore proceed to the consideration of the next charge.

It is alleged that in the spring of 1817, while Jeffery had charge of the house at Tunbridge Wells, Mr. Bramwell passed a night at the Castle Inn, and that on that night only she had a bed at this tavern in a room nearly adjoining the one set apart from Bramwell, and opening into the same passage; that by his order the door of his bedroom was left open; and that on the night in question they slept together in her room. This is the substance of this charge, and it is proved that on the occasion referred to Jeffery drank tea with Bramwell, and, instead of returning to the house of which she had the care, remained during that night at the inn; and on the following morning her bed retained the impressions of two persons. These facts, together with the situation of the respective rooms, certainly lay a case of extremely strong suspicion—that on that night Bramwell and Jeffery slept together in her room. It certainly is very difficult for the Court not to arrive at that conclusion; and if the letters, on which I shall presently comment, had borne distinct reference to this particular period, and had been coupled with previous familiarities, I should not have hesitated in so doing: but this charge is coupled with no previous distinct familiarity; and, from its remoteness, subsequent familiarities cannot operate upon it retrospectively with any great force. However strongly, therefore, I might be inclined, as an individual, to draw from these facts an inference of guilt, I hardly feel justified in my judicial ca-[622]-pacity to pronounce that adultery was committed on this particular night.

No other specific act is charged till 1824. What, however, took place in the interval is extremely suspicious. The first circumstance powerfully affecting my mind is, that Elizabeth Jeffery—the nurse in Mr. Bramwell's family, a young unmarried woman, not in the slightest degree educated for such an occupation—is put by Mr. Bramwell into the Castle Inn, as mistress, in the year 1821: and in this and the two following years he frequently went to Tunbridge Wells, passed several days at this inn, and associated with Jeffery. The visits and intercourse are admitted; but it is said they were the necessary result of business at Tunbridge Wells; and that before Jeffery left Mr. and Mrs. Bramwell's service she was treated by them as a companion.

Such are the excuses offered for the intimacy; but improper familiarities cannot be justified by any supposed necessity for frequent intercourse; and if the guilty inclination be proved, undoubtedly there was ample opportunity for gratifying a criminal passion. That such familiarities did pass between Jeffery and her landlord are fully established upon the testimony of three witnesses. Carpenter, then a servant at the inn, proves that he frequently saw them standing by the fire in the bar, Mr. Bramwell's arm round her waist; that on witness entering they moved away and were confused; that he has seen their faces close together as if they were kissing; and in passing by Jeffery's bed room has heard Bramwell's voice in the room, speaking loud and scolding her; and on two occasions, in the morning, he speaks to seeing them both in his mistress' bed room, but dressed.

[623] Mary Earl deposes nearly to the same effect, though perhaps a little stronger: she speaks to endearing expressions, and to kisses. Martha Wiles states that she has seen Bramwell in her mistress' bed room; but that, she adds, was on an occasion of her being ill: she also speaks to a kiss.

Unquestionably this is evidence of improper familiarity: and the witnesses depose to other circumstances which demonstrate a guilty attachment. I do not, however, entirely rely on their evidence, although nothing has been, or indeed can well be, urged to affect the credit of Carpenter and Wiles: but this undue and guilty familiarity between these parties is manifest from, and confirmed to its full extent by, the letters annexed to Mrs. Bramwell's allegation: they therefore require, before I state my impression of the whole case, a particular attention.

The first exhibit, to which I shall refer, is an unfinished letter, the discovery of which appears to have first raised a suspicion in Mrs. Bramwell's mind of her husband's infidelity. It is now admitted that this exhibit is in Bramwell's writing, and that the person addressed is Elizabeth Jeffery.

"My dearest Betsey, dearest of all women,—Notwithstanding all y^{r} promises y^{r} heavenly and delightful promises I cannot submit to a partner a participator with me in those heavenly and lawful pleasures I have so long treasured up in store. Oh! my dearest Betsey, think me not selfish, or that I do not feel for your situation, what you have gone through for me makes me feel selfishness to such a degree that to know or indeed even think that you should be embraced by another." . . .

[624] This paper is found on the 2d of May, 1826, in Mr. Bramwell's room, and communicated to his wife, who immediately informs him of it by letter, which he thus answers:

"Borough, Wed^{y} evening.

"My dear Wife,—Y^{r} letter I have just rec^{d} and read, its contents does not in the least surprize as I have long seen by your conduct that your confidence in me pourtrays any thing but confidence. Yet I had hoped you had entertained a much nobler opinion of me than I see you do. Am I indeed so fallen to be such deceitful wretch as I must be to have pen'd much less sent such a letter to any one? But I must to the point. Whilst me and George [his servant] was coming out of the Castle yard, Monday evening, George picked up a small wrapper of paper upon which I asked to look at: they appeared scrap of papers; on taking to the light I found something about 'My dearest Betsey' which name being familiar to me I was determined to take a copy of which I did and ret^{d} the scrip again to George who can furnish you with them as I told him to keep 'em. When you have seen them you will then see how unjust you have been with me and how sincere I have been with you. If you had only paused for a moment my seeing Betsey that evening—what could I want to write to her I will take an oath I have not written to her this 12 mths or more I hope to be with you to-morrow when further satisfaction shall be given Besides to Betsey I can no more with kind love remain your affect. but injured husband "WILLIAM"

Is there one single syllable of truth in this [625] letter? The counsel for Mr. Bramwell has avowed that the excuse for writing that paper is not founded in truth: nor was it without indignation that the Court observed Mr. Bramwell, in its presence and hearing, endeavour to induce his counsel (who most properly rejected the suggestion) to persist in this falsehood. What, then, are the inferences from this conduct? Where there is falsehood there is a strong probability of guilt concealed. The denial therefore that this letter was addressed to Jeffery shews that the expressions contained in it are not entitled to a favourable construction, but are proof of a guilty intention.

Some discussion took place on the meaning of the word "lawful;" and it was urged for the husband that the expression referred to a promise of marriage at a future time: but the Court may omit this part of the case: it is not bound to find a sensible interpretation of any rhapsody this person may choose to write. I shall not then attempt to construe nor fix any definite meaning upon this expression "lawful pleasures:" but when I consider that this language is adopted by a married man professing an ardent attachment to a young woman, who had been the nurse of his child, the Court is at a loss to conceive what pleasures can, under such circumstances, properly be denominated lawful. I must then take this document as evidence of criminal attachment and intention though not of absolute guilt. The letter to Mrs. Bramwell, which the Court has also just read, shews the base hypocrisy of the writer, and to what falsehoods he would resort for the purpose of deceiving his wife: he avers that he has not written to Jeffery for more than a year, and yet the very next letter, annexed to the wife's [626] allegation, and addressed to Jeffery, must just have been written by him.

"Borough, 3d May, 1826.

"My dearest my only love,—Since I parted with you, I have done nothing but think of you. Oh how affec^ty^ I love you, every past recollection endears you stronger to me, and I now feel that we are as one, not even death could separate us, for to the grave would I cling to thee. when I think of your candid glorious and most true hearted explanation of Monday I could wet this sheet with my grateful tears. Oh every thing bespeaks that our long attachment has been cherished and cultivated by each other, and has emanated from the hearts core. It has nearly arrived to its height, when we shall soon see it bursting forth and see and feel the delights of sincere and genuine love. Could I but see you now methinks my ardour would scarcely allow me utterance of speech. You told me you thought indeed was assured I love you. Indeed you may and assure yourself this that from the first moment I felt to love you from that moment I felt to respect and to feel that sort of regard that I had never felt so for any other female, or indeed for any one on earth. And yet notwithstanding all this I know I have been and shewn unkindness to you. But rely on this my dear girl, after having shewn it it has immediately fled, and my whole soul and body wrapped up in the most tender and parental affection. Yes my dear Betsey believe me when I tell you that in the midst of all my unkindness that you might have thought me guilty of, the cause has been through my great selfish and ardent affection I have ever felt for you. After the beautiful explanation you [627] have given to me I shall now endeavour to dispossess myself of self and substitute for it a treble gratitude with an increased (if possible) confidence as well as an increase of love and affection. My heart you have had for years, Indeed you have had it almost from the first time I saw you. But when I first press'd my lips to yours then I felt I was alive and you were then in complete possession, fond heart! It now appears and I have not the smallest doubt of it that our hearts are dedicated to each other and no earthly being can dissolve them. Be assured my dear love of this that I shall ever prize the possession of such a heart as yours. I will not only treat it nobly kind and affectionate but will and must ever think of it with tears of gratitude." After a few sentences on business, the letter proceeded: "I forgot to ask you my love about your cold—I hope it is much better and now nearly gone: pray write and let me know y^r^ health is to me every thing my life my joy. I hope to be with you on Saturday. Should I not be able I will write, but pray write me if its only a line address Queens Head Borough. And now my dearest Betsey hav^s^ nearly finished my letter I must conclude with my very best love and prayers for y^r^ health. May we ever have the highest confidence in each other always assuring ourselves that no one ever can rival us in our love the wish and prayer of y^r^ sincere friend warmly attached —Most affect^y^ yours "W^m^ BRAMWELL."

(Superscribed) Mrs. Jeffery Castle Tavern Tunbridge Wells.

Similar observations apply to this letter as those [628] which I have already had occasion to make in commenting upon the first letter. This letter also comes into Mrs. Bramwell's possession: her husband ascertains this, and demands it with much violence; she refuses to deliver it up, hands it over finally to her daughter, who conveys it out of the room, and thus secures it. Mr. Bramwell shortly afterwards succeeds in allaying the suspicions of his wife, and to induce her forgiveness and reconciliation writes the following document:—

"My dearest and beloved wife In the presence of Almighty God I here most solemnly swear and protest that I will never directly or indirectly have any connection or marriage with Elizabeth Jeffery late of the Castle Tavern Tunbridge Wells. Should the word 'connexion' not comprize every thing my dear wife wishes, I further add that I will not see the said Elizabeth again if possible neither will I ever carry on the least correspondence with her. "W^m^ BRAMWELL.

"Sunday 7^th^ May 1826."

The expression "connexion" here used must have one of two meanings—either a criminal connexion, and then the letter would be an admission of adultery; or an innocent connexion, and then it would imply no condonation by the wife.

Taking, then, these documents in conjunction with the familiarities proved (not the familiarities of long acquaintance, nor such as by any means correspond with what in the second letter to Jeffery are termed marks of "parental affection," but such as are the admitted consequences of a guilty attachment), and in conjunction with the fact that there were opportunities without end, are the ambiguous expressions referred to to counter-[629]-balance all these other circumstances, especially when one of the defences is condonation—not a denial of adultery? If the evidence be liable to any doubt, by what rule am I to decide? By the existing probabilities—by coming to that conclusion on doubtful points which is in conformity with clear and established facts.

It is then in evidence that not merely was there a criminal attachment, but also that this attachment was not rejected; that Jeffery admitted his familiarity—received his correspondence—that opportunities were constant: and there is nothing to shew on her part resistance, nor repudiation, nor that she at all discountenanced his passion. To doubt from such circumstances that the consummation followed would be to presume that the effect was not consequent on the natural cause; and that this was a case of extraordinary exception and singular innocence. But the safer rule is to come to a decision in unison with the rest of the evidence: and I can entertain no reasonable doubt that adultery had been committed. To arrive at that conclusion it is not necessary to consider the evidence on the 9th article: the examination of that disgusting testimony may be spared; for I do not found any part of my sentence on Earl's evidence; though I do not say it is wholly discredited.

II. III. Condonation, however, has been set up: but this condonation is not only conditional in the eye of the law, as all condonations are, but it is specially so: and a question might arise, as in the case of Durant v. Durant (1 Hagg. Ecc. 733), whether at the time Mrs. Bramwell forgave the offences of her husband against her the whole of them were known to her, [630] for it was, in that case, laid down by the highest authority that condonation only takes effect upon a full knowledge of all the guilt. That Mrs. Bramwell knew of the adultery, at least to the extent proved, seems highly improbable. If it were necessary, I think there could be little difficulty in shewing that she was not aware of the whole, nor indeed of any part, of it. Her letter of the 10th of May, 1826 (annexed to the responsive allegation), makes it manifest to my mind that she was not then acquainted with her husband's guilt.(a)

It is not, however, in my view of the case, [631] necessary to inquire whether any part of this early adultery has been condoned; still less whether the condonation applied to all that adultery.

IV. For assuming that the condonation was complete, and extended to all the previous adultery, under what circumstances and on what conditions was it given, and (a) This letter was from Tunbridge Wells.

"V. Royal, May 10, 1826.

"My dearest Husband,—It is now past nine o'clock and I have only just this moment rec'd your letter. I cannot tell you how my heart droop'd when I open'd the parcel and found no letter, or how it revived in about ten minutes after when John came up and presented me with one: ten thousand thanks for it, it has relieved my mind from a great weight. I have been but very so so since you left, not having enjoyed either sleep or appetite. Our dear child is indeed a comfort, and a dear good child to her mother. I shall sleep better to-night, I make no doubt, now I have heard from you. This is indeed a memorable day: this time twenty years I was a bride—your first and only love. That you will ever cease loving me I am not afraid of, or that an artful woman will succeed in robbing me either of your love or good what was the duty of the husband and what was his conduct afterwards? He solemnly engaged to separate himself entirely from this woman, and if possible not to carry on the least correspondence with her: yet shortly after this Mr. and Mrs. Bramwell go to Epsom; and he clandestinely returns with Jeffery to Tunbridge Wells.

An attempt has been made to prove that Mrs. Bramwell's letter of 23rd of June to Jeffery was written, as alleged by the husband, in 1826.(a) Taken alone and not in conjunction with other cir-[632]-cumstances, expressions may be selected which may have that tendency. I have not the least doubt, however, that it was written in 1825, when I look at the contents of the letter of the 10th of May, 1826—in regard to which there is no doubt; when I compare that letter with this of the 23rd of June, it is incredible that Mrs. Bramwell could have so expressed herself—"I am not afraid that an artful woman will succeed in robbing me either of your love or good opinion. Oh! had I known or had an idea of the arts she has been practising against an open hearted grateful man, I would, reckless of all pecuniary consequences, have routed her out of the Castle long ago: but enough of the hated subject." With feelings thus expressed, it is, in my opinion, next to impossible that she could have written this letter of the 23d of June—five or six weeks only after an indignant charge against this very woman of an attempt to alienate her husband's affection, and wound her peace of mind.

But how stands the evidence as to the date? Of Mr. Bramwell's allegation—that the letter was written in 1826—there is no proof: Mrs. Bramwell in her answers denies that it was written at that time: and Mrs. Bockett, the parties' daughter, in her evidence goes far to disprove it. When also I consider the secrecy with which Jeffery returned to the Castle in May or June, 1826, the improbability that this invitation was written in that year is increased. Nor does that date tally with the facts: the Castle Inn was not disposed of till August, 1826; and there is nothing to impeach the testimony of Mrs. Bockett, which almost amounts to conclusive proof that the letter must have been written in 1825, while a treaty was pending for the sale of the inn.

[633] What was the conduct of Bramwell after his solemn declaration of the 7th of May, 1826? It has been properly admitted that Wiles (who had become the superintendent of the inn after Jeffery had quitted it) is a candid and fair witness: she states "that, not long after her appointment, she was informed of Jeffery's return to the inn; that Jeffery remained there for nearly a fortnight, confining herself almost opinion. Oh! had I known, or had an idea of the arts she has been practising against an open hearted grateful man, I would, reckless of all pecuniary consequences, have routed her out of the Castle long ago: but enough of the hated subject."

---

The rest of this long letter was unimportant, except in a few passages: e.g. "I trust you are doing all you can to get somebody to put in the Castle; for I cannot bear that girl *[1] should remain in it. . . . I trust after I have recovered from the effects of the shock and agitation I have gone through I shall regain my spirits. . . . I want you to remain here quiet for a little time; for quiet you will be now you have got rid of your tyrannical firebrand. . . . I hope you will give me and the dear child the pleasure of seeing you on Saturday. Believe me, my dear husband, your sincerely attached and most truly affectionate wife, "FANNY BRAMWELL."

(Superscribed) "Mr. Bramwell, Queen's Head Inn, Borough."

(a) "My dearest Betsey,—Will you come and sleep here to-morrow night? I understand from Mr. B. you leave the Castle to-morrow, and intend sleeping from it: if so I can only say here is a bed quite disengaged, and quite at your service, and I shall be happy for you to occupy it, and to talk things over as well as to arrange things as to your future comfort. If you think I wish you otherwise than well (or ever have done) you wrong me, and do not yet know me: now the Castle is disposed of, there is little doubt but you will find me a firm friend, at any rate I shall expect to see you some time to-morrow, and in the mean time believe me your sincere friend,

"FANNY B."

(Superscribed) "Miss Jeffery, June 23, 18 "*[2]

---

*[1] A younger sister of Jeffery's, who had since died.

*[2] The remainder of the date was torn off.

exclusively to her bed-room and a small adjoining sitting-room, and that both Bramwell and Jeffery desired the deponent that her (Jeffery's) being there might be kept a secret from Mrs. Bramwell; that while Jeffery so remained secretly at the Castle Bramwell often came to see her, and used to remain up stairs for a considerable time—sometimes as late as eleven at night." Can it be contended that this was conduct in conformity with Bramwell's solemn engagement? Here was not a solitary meeting, but meetings frequent, for a length of time, and purposely concealed from his wife. Is the Court to believe from the ingenious suggestions of counsel, or from the asseverations of the party, that these meetings were merely to settle accounts? It is true Wiles states that she did see them engaged about accounts; but was it not Mr. Bramwell's duty to have been specially cautious that such interviews should not occur without information to Mrs. Bramwell, and should take place only in the presence of a third party? It is too much to ask of the credulity of the Court not to infer from this conduct a criminal attachment.

Wiles further states that "about a fortnight or three weeks after Jeffery had quitted the Castle (after secretly remaining there as deposed) Bramwell arrived there in his phaeton on a Sunday night at about eleven. Afterwards, on that night, [634] she was informed by Fanny Jeffery that her sister was upstairs; she did not go to see her; but knew that from that time meals were regularly carried upstairs for some one—not a customer—by Fanny Jeffery until the Friday week following, when Elizabeth Jeffery, about two o'clock, came into the bar and staid there till eight, after which the witness did not see her, and she believes she quitted the Castle: during the period aforesaid Bramwell was backwards and forwards at the tavern." What inference, then, can be drawn from this? And when it is likewise in evidence that Mr. Bramwell's servant, George (who was also enjoined to secrecy), drives Jeffery, one night, from Tunbridge Wells to the village of Hertford; and that by these contrivances Mrs. Bramwell's inquiries as to Jeffery's return to Tunbridge Wells were rendered futile; I can arrive at no other conclusion than that this fraud and concealment are proofs of the husband's guilt.

Mrs. Bramwell, it appears, remained for some time with her sister; and was not reconciled to her husband till Biggs, a friend of Bramwell's, after an investigation declared that there was no ground for her suspicions. Biggs, therefore, was not more successful in his inquiries than Mrs. Bramwell had been, and probably from the same reason—the studied concealment of the husband. If it be true that adultery was committed, then the former condonation, if such there was, does not cover it: and this reconciliation by Biggs is no condonation, because it takes place on the husband's averment of his innocence. I am satisfied that adultery did take place prior to the 3rd of May, 1826; and also subsequently; and that the effect of it has not been taken off by the wife's conduct.

[635] V. I will briefly advert to the charge of cruelty. I take it to be acknowledged law, as laid down by the learned Dean of the Arches in Durant v. Durant, that cruelty—to revive condoned adultery—may be less violent in degree and less stringent in proof than when it forms the original charge. In my judgment that principle is quite consistent with reason: I subscribe to it not only from deference to the superior Court, but because I feel it to be most consonant to justice. I am bound to consider this conduct in reference to the husband's prayer that his wife may be compelled to return home, and with reference to the consequences of a non-compliance with a decree of the Court made in conformity with such prayer, viz. excommunication and imprisonment.

Is, then, the cruelty, coupled with the proofs respecting adultery, such as will entitle the wife to her sentence? Undoubtedly the evidence of the cruelty is not so satisfactory as it might have been: but if the witnesses lay a sufficient ground for the Court to conclude that the wife's return to cohabitation would be attended with a reasonable apprehension, or a probable danger, of personal violence, the Court will release her from the duty of such return. It is no answer to say that witnesses, who have not been produced, might have been examined; for if the account before the Court be untrue, the husband might have called those other witnesses to refute the wife's case.

The averments in the 14th article require no very particular comment: they relate to Bramwell's conduct in May, 1826, when, with vehemence of language and force of manner, he attempted to wrest away from Mrs. Bramwell his [636] long letter to Jeffery: but this article is not of such importance as the 21st and 22d articles. Upon the 21st Mrs. Bockett deposes to this effect: "That in June, 1827, while she was residing in Euston Place with her father and mother, the latter was informed that Bramwell and Jeffery had been seen walking together, and that Jeffery was living near to them: her mother mentioned this communication to Bramwell, adding that she did not believe it after his solemn promises not to see Jeffery again: that Bramwell flew into a violent passion, stamped upon the floor, broke the bell-rope, dashed a chair against the drawing-room wall, knocked off the top of the witness' harp, used dreadful oaths, continued in a passion for a couple of hours, and caused both mother and daughter great alarm." On the 22d article she says, "In the afternoon of the 26th of January, 1828, while they were living in Tavistock Place, her father asked her mother for 50l.: she refused, saying 'that he had had sufficient already, and she must have something for house expenses.' He was very indignant, and a violent scene ensued: deponent having observed that her mother ought not to give the cheque, he directed his rage against her, struck her a blow as she was sitting, and used most abusive laguage [which is detailed] to both: deponent and her mother prepared to leave the house; he swore that neither should; tore off his daughter's bonnet, nearly strangled her with the strings, and crushed it to pieces: she attempted to leave the room; he forcibly held her back, and struck her several times: the people of the house come up stairs; he orders the street door to be locked, continues to swear violently at deponent, and to [637] call her by opprobrious epithets. Mrs. Bramwell gets into the next house by the balcony, returns with two gentlemen; they, in vain, endeavour to reason with Bramwell; he aims another blow, which is warded off; and the witness finally escapes to her aunt's in Mecklenburg Square, where she is followed in two or three days by her mother, and they go down to the aunt's house at Epsom—Mrs. Bramwell's health being much affected." This is the substance of Mrs. Bockett's evidence on this part of the case; and, on the 22d article, her account is amply corroborated by the servant Carpenter, who, on hearing a loud scream, goes up stairs with the landlord and landlady of the house, and speaks to what occurred afterwards.

The only provocation here was a recommendation that the cheque should not be given; and it cannot gravely and seriously be argued that this would justify a husband and a father striking a wife and a daughter; this is direct cruelty: and can it be said that such conduct to the daughter is not cruelty to the mother? No such principle is to be found in the cases. Here is a wife who has discharged all the duties that belonged to a wife with kindness, fidelity, and perseverance. After she was apprized of her husband's criminal attachment, she yet follows him to two prisons, and what is the return she meets with?—treatment both to herself and to her daughter quite unjustifiable. I am then to look whether I can pronounce that the wife could return to her husband in safety: that is the primary consideration in all cases of cruelty. I do not say that the cruelty is such as would entitle the wife to a separation on [638] an original suit; but, coupled with the evidence of adultery, it is quite ample.

I have not adverted to the evidence of the two Emerys on Bramwell's allegation, because I do not give any credit to it; nor to that of Cross, because it does not interfere with the sentence of the Court—that the wife is entitled to a separation from her husband by reason of his cruelty and adultery; and I accompany this sentence with a condemnation of the husband in all the costs.

Separation pronounced for.

[639] CONWAY OTHERWISE BEAZLEY v. BEAZLEY. Consistory Court of London, Easter Term, 4th Session, 1831.—The lex loci contractus as to marriage will not prevail when either of the contracting parties is under a legal incapacity by the law of the domicil; and therefore a second marriage, had in Scotland on a Scotch divorce (à vinculo) from an English marriage between parties domiciled in England at the times of such marriages and divorce is null.—Quære, whether such divorce would be invalid if the parties were then bonâ fide domiciled in Scotland: still more, if the first marriage took place during a mere casual visit to England, both parties being at all times domiciled in Scotland?—In the absence of proof that registers of episcopal chapels at Edinburgh are by the law of Scotland documents of an authentic and public nature, copies thereof rejected as inadmissible by the law of England.

[Referred to, Shaw v. Gould, 1868, L. R. 3 H. L. 71; Niboyet v. Niboyet, 1878, 4 P. D. 16; Harvey v. Farnie, 1880, 6 P. D. 44.]

This was a cause of nullity of marriage promoted by Emily Frances Conway against Samuel Beazley by reason of a former marriage by him contracted. The libel, after pleading the marriage by banns of Beazley and Miss Richardson at Kensington on the 20th of May, 1810, cohabitation and consummation, alleged "that, in consequence of disagreements, Beazley, in 1813, withdrew from his wife's society, and on the 29th of August, 1823, a pretended divorce by reason of adultery having been obtained by Mrs. Beazley in the Commissary Court of Edinburgh, Beazley was on the 26th of July, 1824, married by banns in the presence of witnesses to Miss Conway, in St. Paul's Chapel, Edinburgh, according to the ceremonies of the Church of England;" (a)[1] and exhibited a copy of the entry of such marriage "faithfully extracted from the register book of marriages kept by Mr. Marshall of Edinburgh, treasurer to the said chapel."(b)[1] It then pleaded cohabitation in Soho Square, Middlesex, and that Mrs. B. (formerly Richardson) was alive on the 26th of July, 1824; [640] passed by the name of Moggridge,(a)[2] and after having resided at Reading, died and was buried there in December, 1830.

Addams in objection to the libel. A contract must be construed by the law of the country where it was made. Holman v. Johnson, Cowp. 341. Robinson v. Bland, 1 Black. Rep. 256. There is no exception in favour of a contract of marriage. Dalrymple v. Dalrymple, 2 Hagg. Con. 58. Erskine's Law of Scotland, b. 1, t. 6, s. 23. But it will be said that by the law of England marriage is indissoluble, and therefore that the sentence of divorce in Scotland is void. Lolley's case will be relied on; (b)[2] the effect however of that decision is, as I apprehend, that if in the present case the second marriage had been contracted in England, it would be invalid: but in fact the second marriage was in Scotland.

The lex loci is valid except when it produces injustice, or is contra bonos mores: but can it be contended that a divorce, on proof of adultery, and a subsequent marriage are unjust or contra bonos mores? Such divorces and marriages are by the divine law allowed and sanctioned. By the older canon law divorce à vinculo was admitted; the Council of Trent however altered that law; but the authority of that council is not admitted here. Till Foljambe's case (Moor, 683; 3 Salk. 138; 2 Burn, Ecc. Law, 503), in the Star Chamber [641] before Archbishop Bancroft, temp. Q. Eliz., divorce for adultery was à vinculo matrimonii: and in all acts of parliament on this matter the language is uniform—that the party has by his or her behaviour dissolved the marriage. No deceit nor fraud is charged: both parties acted upon the divorce and married again. The second marriage being then a Scotch contract, the whole question is to be determined by the law of Scotland.

The King's advocate and Phillimore contrà. The argument has proceeded on the assumption that this is a question of Scotch contract: but the argument is ill timed, for the Court has no knowledge of the effect of a Scotch divorce—a matter of foreign law and not before it. The indissolubility of the English marriage contracted between parties domiciled in England has not been sufficiently considered; and the whole point turns upon that. In Dalrymple v. Dalrymple there was no previous contract to be dissolved: it was singly and absolutely a question of Scotch contract.

By the jus gentium the law of the country where the contract is entered into is to regulate: though the Scotch lawyers hold that in a contract of marriage the law of Scotland has nothing to do with the lex loci contractûs: "the mere fact of the marriage having been celebrated in England—whether between English or Scotch parties—is not per se a defence against an action of divorce for adultery committed in Scotland." Fergusson's Reports, p. 116, n. Tovey v. Lindsay, 1 Dow, 117, was sent back to Scotland with an intimation that the decision should be revised: but nothing

---

(a)[1] It appeared in evidence that they had some days previously signed the civil contract before the magistrate, and been married according to a Scotch form.

(b)[1] The exhibit was as follows:—"Samuel Beazley, Esq., and Miss Emily Frances Conway were married by certificate of banns from St. Andrew's parish, this 26th day of July, 1824, by the Rev. Mr. Morehead."

(a)[2] It was in evidence that after the divorce she had married a gentleman of that name.

(b)[2] 1 Russ. and Ry. Cr. Cases, 236. See also notices of the same case in Tovey v. Lindsay, 1 Dow, 124, et seq.; and a note of the proceedings for divorce in the Scotch Courts, in Fergusson's Rep. Appendix, 269.

further was done, as the lady died. The observations of Lord [642] Eldon and Lord Redesdale in that case pretty strongly express their opinions that a Scottish divorce will not dissolve an English marriage. There have been three subsequent decisions in the Scotch Courts on English marriages—Duntze v. Levett, Dec. 21, 1816. Edmonstone v. Lockhart, March, 1816, and Kibblewhite v. Rowland, February, 1817. In these cases, as well as in Butler v. Forbes, March, 1817, where the marriage was celebrated in Scotland between parties domiciled in Ireland; and in Utterton v. Teuch, Oct., 1811, where the marriage was in England (all reported in Fergusson), the Commissary Court rejected the conclusion for divorce à vinculo matrimonii: the superior Court, however, reversed these decisions in all these cases; and no appeal has been taken to the House of Peers. But the decisions of the superior Scotch Court are directly at variance with Lolley's case, with M'Carthy v. De Caix,(a) and the intimation of the House of Lords in Tovey v. Lindsay.

Per Curiam. Dr. Lushington. The question raised upon the admissibility of this libel is one of extreme importance, and which [643] might have been expected to have arisen at a much earlier period.

On the 20th of May, 1810, Mr. Beazley, one of the parties in this cause, married a Miss Richardson at Kensington, Middlesex: on the 29th of August, 1823, they were divorced by sentence of the Commissary Court at Edinburgh, and in 1824 Mr. Beazley contracted a second marriage at Edinburgh with Emily Conway, the other party in this cause. The first wife did not die till 1830, and the second wife now prays to have her marriage annulled on the ground that when that marriage was solemnized Mr. Beazley had a wife alive.

It has been said that the Court is bound to admit this libel, though questions of great moment may hereafter arise, and that the divorce at Edinburgh was only pleaded because it was deemed improper to keep the Court in ignorance of that circumstance. If a fact of such magnitude had been suppressed, I am of opinion that any sentence pronounced by the Court would have very little availed the parties—that it would not have been finally binding, but would have been open to re-examination—that such suppression would, in short, have rendered all the proceedings liable to impeachment. An endeavour to obtain a sentence when any such material information was withheld would be unfair towards the Court, and prejudicial to the due administration of justice.

Even with my present imperfect information, I must consider both what is the law of England and what the law of Scotland. Cases have been cited in which it is alleged that a final decision has been pronounced by very high authority upon the operation of a Scotch divorce on an English [644] marriage—that it has been determined that a marriage celebrated in England cannot be dissolved by the sentence of a Scotch tribunal—that the contract remains for ever indissoluble. The authorities principally relied upon for establishing that position are the decisions of the twelve judges in Lolley's case, and the decision of the present Lord Chancellor on a very recent occasion. If those authorities sustained to its full extent the doctrine contended for, the Court would feel implicitly bound to adopt it; but I must consider whether in Lolley's case it was the intention of those very learned persons to decide a principle of universal operation absolutely and without reference to circumstances, or whether they must not almost of necessity be presumed to have confined themselves to the particular circumstances that were then under their consideration. Lolley's case is very briefly reported: none of the authorities cited on the one side or on the other are referred to, nor are the opinions of the learned judges given at any length; all that we have is the decision. It is much to be regretted that some more extended report of the very learned arguments which I well remember were urged upon that occasion, and the multitude of authorities quoted have not been communicated to the profession and to the public.

(a) The following note of M'Carthy v. De Caix, Chancery, 1831, May 10th (2 Russ. & M. 614), was read in the course of the argument.

Mr. Tuke having married in England was divorced in Denmark: the wife came to England and died: the husband took out letters of administration in England to his wife, and upon his death there was a suit in Chancery between his executors and the next of kin of his wife relative to her property.

Brougham, Lord Chancellor, decreed in favour of the executors, observing that the English marriage could not be annulled by the Danish law.

In that case the indictment stated that on the 18th of July Lolley was married at Liverpool to Ann Levaia, and afterwards to Helen Hunter, his former wife being then living. It was proved that both marriages were duly solemnized at Liverpool, that the first wife was alive a week before the assizes, and that the second wife agreed to marry the prisoner if he could obtain a [645] divorce. The jury did not find that any fraud had been committed; but there does not appear to have been any discussion upon the very important question of domicil. A case in which all the parties are domiciled in England and resort is had to Scotland (with which neither of them have any connexion) for no other purpose than to obtain a divorce à vinculo, may possibly be decided on principles which would not altogether apply to a case differently circumstanced; as where, prior to the cause arising on account of which a divorce was sought, the parties had been bonâ fide domiciled in Scotland. Unless I am satisfied that every view of this question had been taken, the Court cannot, from the case referred to, assume it to have been established as an universal rule that a marriage had in England, and originally valid by the law of England, cannot under any possible circumstances be dissolved by the decree of a foreign Court.

Before I could give my assent to such a doctrine (not meaning to deny that it may be true) I must have a decision after argument upon such a case as I will now suppose, viz., a marriage in England—the parties resorting to a foreign country, becoming actually, bonâ fide, domiciled in that country, and then separated by a sentence of divorce pronounced by the competent tribunal of that country. If a case of that description had occurred and had received the decision of the twelve judges, or the other high authority to which allusion has been made, then indeed it might have set this important matter at rest: but I am not aware that that point has ever been distinctly raised, and I think I may say with certainty that it never has received any express decision.

[646] The Court enters upon a consideration of the law of Scotland with great reluctance and much diffidence, from a fear of being led into error upon a question of foreign law. At the same time, this matter has been so frequently discussed, and there are so many reported cases upon the subject, that it cannot be treated as a matter completely hidden in the abstruse recesses of a law entirely foreign to us. I believe the course of decision in Scotland up to the present hour has been to consider that the Scotch Courts have a right to entertain jurisdiction with respect to marriages had in England, after the parties had been resident for a certain period in Scotland, though that period had been infinitely too short to constitute what we should call a legal domicil: and that those Courts have proceeded in such cases to divorce à vinculo. At one time the Commissary Court in Scotland was much inclined in such cases to modify that remedy by substituting for the divorce à vinculo separation a mensâ et toro: but the Court of Session—the Court of Appeal—overruled the decisions of the Commissary Court refusing the divorce à vinculo, and directed that Court to proceed in the accustomed and ordinary way. None of those cases, I believe, have received the sanction of the House of Lords.

It is obvious that many most important differences may arise in cases of this description. Two Scotch persons married in England may afterwards go to reside in Scotland. Again, one of the contracting parties may be English, the other Scotch. If the law of Scotland continue such as their Courts have hitherto held it to be, and if the decision in Lolley's case be of universal application, the issue of the second marriage may [647] be legitimate in Scotland and illegitimate in England. The son may take the real estate in Scotland and not the real estate in England; he might possibly even be a Scotch peer and lose his English title and with it the English estates, the only support of his Scotch peerage. It is impossible, therefore, to exaggerate the importance of this case; nor can the Court be too guarded against laying down any principle which might affect any other case than the present.

It has been argued that I must decide by the lex loci contractûs, that this being a Scotch marriage must be determined by the law of Scotland alone, and by reference to what would be the decision of Scotch courts. I can entertain very little doubt but that the second marriage would be held valid in Scotland, unless some judgment of the House of Lords, in opposition to the repeated decisions of the Court of Session, should ascertain that the law of Scotland is not what those decisions have pronounced it to be.

But there is a preliminary consideration—the capability of the parties to contract marriage—and the true question is whether that capability is to be determined by the law of Scotland or the law of England: the former would say that the parties are capable; the latter, supposing Lolley's case to govern the present, would say they are incapable.

I regret that the libel contains no averment of the domicil of the parties in England at the period of the first marriage: and that it merely pleads that a pretended divorce took place, without stating when or for what purposes the parties went into Scotland, how long they had resided there, or at what period this suit was commenced. [648] These omissions undoubtedly involve the Court in considerable difficulty. If this case, in these respects, prove similar to Lolley's case, I unquestionably should consider that authority to be binding upon me; but if it should be distinguished by other circumstances, such as by the permanent domicil of the parties in Scotland prior to the time when the divorce took place, I must reserve my opinion upon the question until I have heard it argued, and until all the facts and circumstances are fully before me.

I shall therefore admit this libel: but it certainly would be a great satisfaction to me if it could be reformed by pleading the domicil of the parties at the times of the marriages and of the divorce, and the circumstances relative to the divorce: because (though it may rest upon the party maintaining the validity of the marriage to plead the facts upon which he relies for that purpose) in cases of nullity of marriage all the circumstances should appear distinctly upon the face of the libel, in order that no doubt could be entertained of the principles upon which the sentence of the Court is founded.

The King's advocate. Undoubtedly further information would have been supplied if it had been supposed that the case would rest upon the libel only: we conceived that the other party would plead before the Court was called upon for its decision. However, as far as I am instructed, the second wife is not in possession of the facts and circumstances connected with the residence of the parties at the periods in question. Such information as we can obtain shall be laid before the Court in an additional article: but we shall not be [649] in a condition to plead those further facts till we receive information from Scotland.

Per Curiam. The Court might be placed in an extremely inconvenient position if the other party should not plead, and it had to pronounce its decision upon a doubtful state of circumstances.

Libel admitted.

An additional article (admitted without opposition) pleaded: "That Beazley's first wife was the daughter of Richardson, of the parish St. James, Westminster, where she had resided from her childhood, and that at the time of her marriage with Beazley, and during their subsequent cohabitation, they were respectively domiciled in England. That from their separation Beazley continued to reside in England till the beginning of 1823, when he went to Scotland on business as an architect, meaning to return to England as soon as it was concluded: that in April, 1823, when Mrs. Beazley instituted proceedings in Scotland against her husband, she was not residing nor had ever resided in Scotland, but was living in London." (a)

The libel and additional article were fully [650] proved by seven witnesses. Mr. Beazley's sister, who was in Edinburgh and was present at the second marriage, gave evidence of that fact.

23rd July.—The King's advocate and Phillimore. Lolley's case has determined this case: the legal domicil of both parties was England. The second marriage being had in Scotland is the only distinction between this case and that of Lolley.

Addams contrà. A marriage is good or bad according to the lex loci contractûs, unless that law is contra bonos mores. The English marriage was good when the

(a) Mrs. Beazley's sister deposed: "On the occasion of the proceedings instituted by my sister to obtain a divorce, she went to Scotland and remained there from two to three months: she never resided in Scotland but upon that occasion. I cannot say whether my sister went to Scotland for the purpose of instituting the proceedings, or whether her attendance there was required in the course of them; but I know that she never resided in Scotland before those proceedings, and that her home, though she went to Scotland for the occasion, was my father's house in London or Epsom, and at no time in Scotland."

English law, the Scotch marriage when, by the removal into Scotland, the Scotch law, governed the contracting parties.

Judgment—Dr. Lushington. I feel very deeply the responsibility of deciding this case; it behoves me to proceed with the most cautious and wary steps: there is no doubt of the proof and of the validity of the first marriage in 1810; of the separation of the parties in 1813, and of the divorce in Scotland in 1823, at the instance of Mrs. Beazley; and of the domicil of both parties in England. The Court did not require that it should be alleged that the effect of a Scotch divorce was to leave the parties at liberty to enter into another marriage, because it would have put them to the expence of proving that which was perfectly notorious. There is no doubt by the Scotch law of the validity, as to form, of the second marriage; but that is not the important point. However, in supply of proof of that mar-[651]-riage a copy of the register of the Episcopal Chapel at Edinburgh has been exhibited. I am not aware that such registers are, according to the law of Scotland, documents of an authentic and public nature: nor that a copy of an unauthentic register is by that law admitted as evidence. But according to the law of this country, as I believe it has been practised in the Courts of Westminster Hall, I think I should act more safely by rejecting it. I consider it to be of the highest importance that this Court should adhere to the same rules of evidence as prevail elsewhere: indeed, I should entertain some doubts whether ecclesiastical sentences could be received in the Courts of Westminster Hall as conclusive, if it were known that they were founded on evidence altogether inadmissible by the rules of those tribunals; but however this might be, it is certainly wiser to adhere to the same principles wherever practicable. It would therefore only be after great consideration and hesitation, or after being bound by an express decision of the superior Court, that I could consent to admit such an exhibit; and I reject it, the more readily, as the establishment of such a precedent in this case would be perfectly gratuitous, since the marriage is proved by a witness who was present at the ceremony: and since, in point of fact, a Scotch marriage by banns is not more valid than a less formal marriage.

One only distinction exists between this case and that of Lolley, viz., that here the second marriage took place in Scotland: in neither case is there any proof of collusion in resorting to Scotland; and in neither case is there any domicil in Scotland; and, as in my judgment the question of domicil might form a most important and distinguishing feature, the due effect of a Scotch [652] domicil on the decision of these cases would demand a very careful consideration. That, however, does not arise in the present case.

It has been urged that this second marriage was to be decided solely with reference to the lex loci contractûs: undoubtedly, questions of marriage are primâ facie to be judged of by the law of the country where they are solemnized; but I am of opinion that, before considering the second marriage, I must ascertain the capability of the parties to contract. If both the parties, being at the respective times of the first marriage and of the divorce domiciled English subjects, were by the law of England prohibited by a personal incapacity from entering into such a contract, I must apply the rule of that law. Thus in Doe v. Vardill (5 B. and C. 438) it was decided, on the statute of Merton, that a person born ante justas nuptias of parents domiciled in Scotland and subsequently intermarrying there, was under a personal disability to inherit landed property in England, though the Judges carefully abstained from giving any opinion against his legitimacy: but had his parents been domiciled in England at the time of his birth and subsequently intermarried, he would have been prevented by a personal disability from becoming legitimate by that subsequent marriage, and from deriving in Scotland the benefits to which, but for that personal disability, he would upon such marriage be entitled by the law of Scotland.(b)

It is useless, however, to reason from principles or analogy. I am bound by authority: for since [653] it now appears that neither of the parties to the first marriage were at any time bonâ fide domiciled in Scotland, no sound distinction exists between the present case and that of Lolley. I therefore pronounce the second marriage null and void. My judgment, however, must not be construed to go one step beyond the present case: nor in any manner to touch the case of a divorce à vinculo pronounced in Scotland between parties who, though married when domiciled in England, were at the time of such divorce bonâ fide domiciled in Scotland; still less between parties who were only on a casual visit in England at the time of their marriage, but were both then and at the time of the divorce bonâ fide domiciled in Scotland.

(b) See Sheddon v. Patrick, and the case of The Strathmore Peerage, cited, arguendo, by Tindal, 5 B. and C. 444, and Rose v. Drummond, House of Lords, 1831.

Sentence of nullity signed.

[655] ORDER OF COURT. Hilary Term, 4th Session, 1832.

Whereas, the commencement of the Law Terms in His Majesty's Courts at Westminster has been altered by the 1st Wm. IV. c. 70: and whereas it will be convenient to the public that the business of the Courts at Doctors' Commons should continue, as heretofore, to commence at or about the same time that it commences in the Courts of Common Law:

I, the undersigned Official Principal of the Court of Arches, having taken the premises into consideration, and having conferred thereon with the Judge of the High Court of Admiralty, the Chancellor of the Diocese of London, and others, do hereby order and direct that in future the first day of each term in the Court of Arches shall be the day on which such term commences in the Courts of Common Law; and that the subsequent sessions and court days in each term shall be appointed in the same manner as they are at present appointed.

(Signed) JOHN NICHOLL.

[657] MYTTON v. MYTTON. Arches Court, Mich. Term, 3rd Session, 1831.—After sentence of separation by reason of gross cruelty and adultery on the part of the husband, the real estate being 6000l. a year, subject, as alleged by the husband, to large incumbrances, the mother's jointure having been 1000l., and the wife's pin-money 500l. a year, the Court allotted 1000l. a year permanent alimony, allowing the husband to deduct from that sum any payment on account of pin-money above 200l. a year—the sum agreed to be paid to the wife for the maintenance of the children.

This was a suit of separation by reason of the husband's cruelty and adultery. A libel of forty-four articles, with eight letters from the husband, had been admitted without opposition: it pleaded the marriage on the 29th of October, 1821, the birth of five children, and cohabitation until the 16th of October, 1830. The witnesses upon this libel having been examined, an allegation for the husband was admitted after debate. The answers of the wife, which negatived all the material averments, were taken upon this allegation, but no witnesses were examined upon it, nor did any counsel appear for the husband at the hearing of the cause; and on this day the Court signed the sentence of separation.

The alimony pending suit had been fixed at 300l. per annum, in addition to 500l. per annum settled as pin-money, and to 200l. promised by the husband as an allowance to his wife for the maintenance of the children, and to be computed from the return of the citation. The present question related to permanent alimony.

Lushington and Dodson for Mrs. Mytton. Mr. Mytton has voluntarily offered to allow to Mrs. Mytton 200l. a year for the maintenance of the children now, and to increase it as they grow older; but he has not paid it, nor have we any means of recovering it. Under the directions of [658] the Court of Chancery the children are to remain with their mother, and to be placed under guardians. His property is large, and the deductions he claims are for the most part the effect of his own follies.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. In this suit the sentence already pronounced has decreed separation à mensâ et toro, at the wife's prayer, on account of the husband's cruelty and adultery; and certainly it is one of the grossest cases of misconduct in both particulars that ever came under the notice of the Court. The allegation of the husband is too offensive and disgusting to detail, but on it no witnesses have been produced: the wife has in her answers negatived all the imputations attempted to be cast upon her. She therefore stands perfectly untainted by his averments.

The present question is what is the proper allowance to be made to the wife while living separate and apart from her husband. The husband by his own account has very large estates, but the answers claim very large deductions. The gross amount of the real estates is stated to be 6000l. per annum, but he claims to subtract 4350l. for incumbrances, and the interest of debts which he has incurred. It is impossible for the wife to go into evidence to ascertain the amount of the net income; nor would the Court be disposed to allow the full deductions claimed on account of outgoings, occasioned by his own extravagance and profligacy. It would look rather to other facts, in order to judge what should be the wife's allowance. The jointure of the mother is 1000l. per annum—that was not considered too large an [659] allowance for his father's widow, and this unfortunate lady is in a worse situation. Again, her pin-money was fixed at 500l. per annum. A husband who has such a fortune as to give that sum as pin-money should make an ample allowance for his wife while living separately on account of his misconduct. The husband, it is stated, has voluntarily undertaken to pay to his wife 200l. a year for the maintenance of the children. That arrangement, however, it is not within the authority of this Court to enforce; but I shall allot 1000l. a year permanent alimony, allowing the husband to deduct from that sum any payments exceeding 200l. a year, which he may actually make on account of pin-money. The wife will thus have the aid of the power of this Court for the payment of the whole 1000l.; and in addition will have a collateral remedy to secure from her pin-money the payment of 200l. a year for the children.

THE OFFICE OF THE JUDGE PROMOTED BY WHISH AND WOOLLATT v. HESSE, Clerk. Arches Court, Mich. Term, 4th Session, 1831.—Simony, on the part of a presentee to a living, being in law a very odious offence, and the consequences of conviction thereof highly penal, the law, even if a simoniacal agreement is established, requires the strictest proof of the presentee's privity thereto before induction, or of his confirmation thereof after; so, in proof that a clerk is simoniacè promotus, a corrupt agreement must be no less conclusively shewn. In a criminal suit against a clerk for simony, and for being simoniacally promoted, the Court holding, 1st, that neither his privity to, nor confirmation of, any simoniacal contract was proved; 2dly, that no criminal contract was established, dismissed him from the suit, and condemned the promoters in costs.—Semble, that when a clerk is simoniacè promotus without his privity or subsequent confirmation, the Ecclesiastical Court cannot proceed to a sentence of deprivation in a criminal suit.—A party cannot except to a witness by contradicting answers to interrogatories which go to incidental, collateral matter, and are not relevant to the issue.—Quære, whether acts subsequent to induction in confirmation of a simoniacal agreement made without his knowledge amount to simony on the part of the presentee.

[Referred to, Lee v. Flack, [1896] P. 145.]

This was a criminal suit brought by the churchwardens of the parish of Knebworth, in the county of Hertford, against the Reverend James Legrew Hesse, the incumbent of the parish, for simony. The citation and præsertim of the articles were "more particularly for having corruptly and simoniacally procured or caused to be procured the [660] presentation to the rectory and parish church of Knebworth aforesaid, and for having accepted the said rectory and parish church; you being privy and consenting to a corrupt and simoniacal procurement of the same, and for having been corruptly and simoniacally presented to the rectory and parish church aforesaid."

The articles set forth:

1. "That by the laws, canons and constitutions ecclesiastical of this realm, if a clerk in holy orders be simoniacally promoted to any benefice or living ecclesiastical, he is deprivable of the same by reason of such simony, on due examination and proof thereof; and that if such clerk shall have been a party or privy to such simony, he is also thereby for ever disabled to take or accept of the same or of any other benefice or living ecclesiastical."

2. The vacancy of the living of Knebworth.

3. (Amongst other things) "That by a decree, pronounced in a cause depending in the Court of Chancery, between the Rev. M. Price, plaintiff (the late rector), and Elizabeth Barbara Bulwer Lytton (the patroness), and other defendants, the defendants, having failed to establish a modus (to wit, of 26l. per annum for lands, the property of Mrs. Lytton, and whereof the tithe was 210l. per annum), it was on the 5th of March, 1829, ordered that the said M. Price, as the rector and incumbent of Knebworth, was lawfully entitled to the full annual tithe of the lands alleged to be covered by the said modus; and that he thenceforward, and during his incumbency, did receive the full tithe of the said lands."

4. Pleaded the intention of appointing Mr. Hesse to the living.

5. "That the intention of Mrs. Bulwer Lytton [661] to present you (Mr. Hesse) to the rectory of Knebworth was by her desire, on the 12th of October, 1830, communicated to your father, Obadiah Hesse, by Kelly, who, at the same time, by the desire of Mrs. Lytton, informed O. Hesse that the living was to be accepted by you subject to the aforesaid alleged modus, which had been the occasion of the litigation between Mrs. Bulwer Lytton and Mr. Price, thereby meaning that you were to be presented to the said rectory by Mrs. Lytton, on condition that you would acknowledge the sum of 26l. per annum to be a lawful consideration, and that you would accept the same as a payment in full, for the tithe of the said lands, which had been, as alleged, covered by the alleged modus; and the lawful tithe of which lands was and is of the annual value of 210l., and which meaning was then and there fully understood by O. Hesse, who in reply told Kelly that he, O. Hesse, was fully aware of the circumstances relating to the alleged modus, and the failure of Mrs. Bulwer Lytton in establishing the same against Price, for that she had consulted him, O. Hesse, in the business; that Kelly then and there, in further explanation of the conditions upon which the said presentation of you was to be made, delivered to O. Hesse a schedule or statement in writing (paper (A)), containing the names of the occupiers of titheable lands in Knebworth; also the quantities and descriptions of the lands, together with the rated annual value of the tithe thereof per acre. That the schedule also contained the estimated annual value of the entire tithes of such lands, and also set forth such of the lands from which an exemption from tithe was claimed in virtue of the illegal modus, and for which same lands it was [662] intended and understood that the annual sum of 26l. per annum should be accepted by you in full discharge of tithe. That the statement also set forth the full estimated annual value of the tithes and glebe of the benefice, and the diminished value of the same if accepted on the condition of receiving 26l. per annum in discharge of the tithes on the lands for which the alleged modus was theretofore claimed. That O. Hesse, referring to the aforesaid offer made by Kelly, of causing you to be presented to the rectory of Knebworth, on the conditions already mentioned, and referring also to the schedule, replied, 'that of course you, or any one, would jump at such a living, upon such terms.' And O. Hesse did also at the same time request Kelly to leave with him the schedule, that he might forward the same to you. That the schedule was accordingly left by Kelly in the possession of O. Hesse, for the purpose aforesaid."

6. Exhibited the schedule, or paper (A).

7. "That on the 12th of October, 1830, Kelly did, on the part and behalf of Mrs. Lytton, inform O. Hesse, that in consideration of the intended presentation of you to the rectory of Knebworth, you would be required to lease to, or exchange with, Mrs. Lytton, certain parts of the glebe convenient for her occupation; and of which portion of the glebe the cow-pasture meadow is part. That O. Hesse did in reply to Kelly, and for you and in your name and on your part and behalf, and in consideration of the intended presentation of you to the rectory of Knebworth, undertake and agree that you would grant a lease to Mrs. Lytton of such parts of the glebe as she might require, or exchange the same with her."

8. "That the conditions of the presentation were [663] communicated to, and a copy of the schedule was perused by, you, J. Hesse, prior to October 16th."

9. "That on or about the 16th of October, 1830, and previous to the signing and execution of the presentation, O. Hesse, for you and in your name, and on your behalf, and by and with your privity and consent, did contract and agree with Lake, then acting in the name and on the part and behalf of Mrs. Bulwer Lytton, that you would, in consideration of being presented by her to the said rectory, demise for ninety-nine years, if you should so long live and continue rector of the said rectory, to Mrs. Lytton, her executors, &c. &c., all tithes, both great and small, within the said rectory, in consideration of an annual rent, to be computed according to the rate contained in the schedule, and in part of such rent accept the annual rent of 26l. in full of the tithe of the lands in the schedule named as being protected by such payment in the way of modus."

10. "That with your consent O. Hesse procured a form of presentation, and attended at the execution thereof on the 16th of October.'

11. Exhibited a copy of the presentation.

12. "That at the time of the execution O. Hesse, by and with your authority and in your behalf, declared to Mrs. Lytton, and for you undertook, that you would grant to her, her executors, &c., a lease of the tenor agreed upon on your behalf with Lake; and that O. Hesse, on the same occasion, being asked by Kelly for the schedule, replied that he had it not with him, but that it should be shortly returned."

13. "That O. Hesse, under your authority, pro-[664]-cured the mandate of induction; and that on the 23d of October you were inducted."

14. Exhibited copies of the mandate and certificate of induction.

15. "That on the 25th of October, you, O. Hesse, G. B. Hesse, and Kelly being at the parsonage, O. Hesse, in your presence, and with your consent, delivered the keys of the house to Kelly, and pointed out the improvements he should make."

16. "That on the 25th of October, you, O. Hesse, Mrs. Lytton and Kelly being together, O. Hesse, in your hearing, and with your authority, proposed to arrange with Kelly as to a lease of glebe to Mrs. Lytton, and letting the rest; that he said he had arranged with a tenant as to the parts Mrs. Lytton did not require, and recommended O. Hesse to settle with Lake as to the leases of the glebe and tithes; that in your hearing O. Hesse replied 'that you must not be too precipitate in granting a lease of the tithes, but that in the mean time every thing should be done to Mrs. Lytton's satisfaction.'"

17. "That on the 25th of October you, accompanied by O. Hesse (in part performance of the agreement in consideration whereof you were presented), went to two cottages belonging to the glebe, and gave notice to the tenants immediately to quit, and give the keys to Kelly, as the agent to Mrs. Lytton, who was then present; that from thence you went to the cow-pasture meadow, when, in your hearing, O. Hesse said to Kelly, 'This is the field Mrs. Lytton wants:' that you, fearing such simoniacal agreement should be overheard, pointed to the cottages and to O. Hesse, and said, 'Hush, governor,' and Kelly [665] then, on behalf of Mrs. Lytton, in your hearing, said, 'The cow-pasture was a part of the glebe of which Mrs. Lytton required a lease.'"

18. "That with your consent, and in anticipation of the lease, Kelly, on the 28th of October, took possession of the said pasture and underlet it."

19. "That on the 27th of October O. Hesse, acting for you, addressed Kelly, at Lake's chambers, thus, 'I know what you are come about, it is the lease,' and that O. Hesse then, by your authority, gave Lake verbal instructions to draw a lease of the Knebworth tithes to Mrs. Lytton, her executors, &c."

20. "That since the agreements for such lease, woods of Mrs. Lytton liable to tithe, but heretofore claimed to be exempt, have been cut, and no tithe demanded nor received."

21. "That in the premises O. Hesse has acted as your agent, and under your authority."

22. "That by reason of the premises you have corruptly and simoniacally procured or accepted the rectory of Knebworth, and that the same hath, with your privity and consent, been corruptly and simoniacally procured or obtained for you and accepted by you, and that you have been corruptly and simoniacally presented to the said rectory, and that you ought to be canonically corrected and punished according to the exigency of the law." And the articles concluded by praying that the defendant should be so punished and corrected.

An allegation, on the part of the defendant, first, generally denied and contradicted the charges; and then pleaded: That on the 12th of October, 1830, Kelly called upon O. Hesse, who generally resided in Somersetshire, but was then [666] in London, at the chambers of his son, G. B. Hesse, a conveyancer residing in the Temple. That Kelly then, in the presence of G. B. Hesse, delivered to O. Hesse a sealed letter from Mrs. Lytton, dated the 9th October, 1830, and addressed to O. Hesse, and inclosing an unsealed letter from Mrs. Lytton to Mrs. Hesse, the wife of O. Hesse. These letters related to the presentation. That O. Hesse, having perused both letters, expressed himself in terms of acknowledgment and obligation to Mrs. Lytton for the preferment she proposed to bestow on his son: that during this interview Kelly stated that he had, as near as he was able, ascertained the value of the living, and then delivered to O. Hesse a paper, which Kelly declared contained the quantity and description of titheable lands in the parish, and the annual value of the entire tithes. That upon the paper being so delivered to O. Hesse he, in a slight and cursory manner, glanced over the same; that the paper was left by Kelly voluntarily, and of his own accord, in the possession of O. Hesse, and not at his request. That the paper remained in the possession of O. Hesse until the forenoon of the 16th of October, when, in pursuance of the directions of Mrs. Lytton, he delivered it to Lake, her solicitor. That during the time the paper remained in the possession of O. Hesse he did not peruse the same, nor transcribe, nor make, nor cause to be transcribed or made, a copy of the same, nor transmit, or cause to be transmitted, either the original paper, or a copy thereof; nor in any manner communicate, or cause to be communicated, the contents or substance thereof, to the Rev. J. L. Hesse; and that until the articles given in this cause were perused by the Rev. J. L. Hesse, he never saw [667] the original exhibit marked A, nor any copy or transcript thereof: that during the aforesaid interview, and at a time when O. Hesse was reading to himself a part of one of the letters, Kelly observed, "There are moduses to which the living is subject, of course Mrs. Lytton gives the living subject to them;" and added, "She has had a great deal of trouble about them;" that O. Hesse (who at that time knew nothing of the said modus or moduses, and was then engaged in reading one of the letters) did not in any manner reply thereto, or make any observation thereon; but the same was heard by G. Hesse, who remarked, "That he was sure his brother would not be disposed to give Mrs. Lytton any trouble or vexation." That O. Hesse, upon being informed by Kelly that Mrs. Lytton would be in town at twelve o'clock on the 14th of October, requested Kelly to present his compliments, and inform her that he would at that time call upon her: that Kelly thereupon took his leave, having on that occasion been not more than ten minutes with O. Hesse and G. Hesse. That this interview on the 12th of October was the only interview O. Hesse had with Kelly on the subject of the presentation; and that upon that occasion no stipulation was made, or even suggested, either by Kelly or O. Hesse, nor any undertaking or agreement entered upon, engaged for, or contemplated by O. Hesse, for leasing to or exchanging with Mrs. Lytton any piece of land; and that no allusion was made to such a lease or exchange; and that nothing passed between Kelly and O. Hesse, either directly or indirectly, in reference to such a matter; and that neither O. nor G. Hesse, who was present during the whole of the interview, was at the time, or upon the [668] occasion aforesaid, informed of, or acquainted with, the failure of Mrs. Lytton to establish the modus or moduses. That Mrs. Lytton had not at any time consulted O. Hesse upon any dispute or litigation between her and the Rev. Mr. Price. That until the articles in this cause were given in, O. Hesse had not received and was not in possession of any information that a decree or order touching the said moduses had been made. That no conversation other than what is hereinbefore set forth passed on the said occasion between O. Hesse and Kelly in reference to the living, or the presentation thereto, or the tithes thereof, or the modus or moduses alleged to belong to the rectory.

3. Exhibited the letters A and B.(a)

[669] 4. That on the 16th of October, when O. Hesse, by Mrs. Lytton's direction, delivered to Lake the paper left by Kelly, Lake said, "The moduses are, I have no doubt, perfectly good: the quantity of glebe shews them to be so:" and added, "Richardson, a former agent of Mrs. Lytton's, had persuaded her to ask a lease of all the tithes; but this (Lake said) would bring all engaged in such a lease to a state of law in less than twelvemonths:" that O. Hesse replied, "Such a lease might be attended with difficulties, that he had no power to accede to it;" and added, "It must

---

(a) The letters were in the terms following:—

(A)

"My dear Sir,—I have inclosed you a letter, open, to my esteemed friend, Mrs. Hesse, which I hope you will approve. This letter I should have sent a few days ago, but have been every day expecting to come to town: but finding that impracticable before the time you think of leaving, I will no longer defer making the communication expressed in Mrs. Hesse's letter, in writing. Any particulars you may wish to know, relative to it, the bearer, my steward, can inform you.

"Oct. 9th, 1830."

(B)

"My dear Mrs. Hesse,—That I have ever been grateful for the sentiments of kindness and affection I have experienced from you, and that I have ever been desirous of an opportunity of shewing how sensibly I have felt the same, I am rejoiced indeed be understood that I can undertake nothing of the sort for my son," to which Lake answered, "I told Mrs. Lytton so when she mentioned what Richardson had advised."

5. That on the 14th of October O. Hesse had an interview with Mrs. Lytton, when she fixed the 16th to execute the presentation: that after it was executed, Kelly said to O. Hesse, "It would be a convenience to Mrs. Lytton to rent a field of the glebe to let with a house of her own; and also that she wished to get rid of two old women, tenants of cottages belonging to the rectory, as they were offensive to her:" that O. Hesse replied that he had no doubt his son would do what he could to accommodate Mrs. Lytton.

6. That on the 12th of October, 1830, the defendant was rector of Rowbarrow, Somersetshire; and was then, and had been for several preceding [670] weeks, resident at Burrington, close adjoining thereto: that Mrs. Hesse received on the 13th, at Burrington, Mrs. Lytton's letter (B); and that she immediately communicated it to the Rev. J. L. Hesse, who previously thereto had no knowledge whatever respecting the presentation, and did not communicate, either directly or indirectly, with any person as to the same till the 19th, when, in London, he received the presentation.

7. That on the 25th, while looking at the glebe, the Rev. J. L. Hesse, being informed by Kelly that the then tenant wished to continue the arable, replied that he would consent for that year; and then expressing his intention of holding himself all the pasture, requested Kelly, as his agent, to make the most of it till the pastures were shut up for hay; and that nothing else then passed in reference to the same.

8. That on the 25th of October Mrs. Lytton informed the Rev. J. L. Hesse and G. B. Hesse that two of the rector's cottagers were infamous women, and had perjured themselves against her, and on that account she wished them dismissed: and on the same day the Rev. J. L. Hesse and O. Hesse went to the cottages, and finding the said women very old, deaf, and infirm, and that they had been tenants of the cottages for many years, wished to impress upon Kelly (who was with them) the injustice of turning them out; that while O. Hesse was speaking on the subject in an elevated voice the Rev. J. L. Hesse said, "Hush, governor:" and in reference to the continued solicitations of Kelly, added, "I have a conscience:" and that, save that the Rev. J. L. Hesse informed the women that he should want the cottages for his own occupation while the parsonage was [671] under repair, he did not then, nor at any other time, give them notice to quit; that without his knowledge and contrary to his intention they were in his absence turned out.

9. That on the 27th, Lake, at his chambers, having informed O. Hesse "that Kelly had come to ask for a lease of the tithes for Mrs. Lytton," O. Hesse, greatly surprised, exclaimed, "A lease of the tithes!" that Kelly then entered the room, and upon his expressing Mrs. Lytton's great anxiety to have the lease, and that to keep her in good humour a lease should, subject to future consideration, be drawn out, O. Hesse, for the purpose of preventing any untimely disagreement with her, finally acquiesced that a draft should be prepared, and stated, "That every thing that was for the comfort and convenience of Mrs. Lytton that was proper would be done, but that was all he could do or say:" that no further or other communication or interview passed in which O. Hesse was a party in respect to the lease until the 4th of November, when Lake forwarded to him the draft, which the Rev. J. L. Hesse refused to execute. That at no time either before or after the execution of the presentation was O. Hesse authorized by the Rev. J. L. Hesse to act as his agent.

I have now a proof in my power to give, and which I hope you will consider as a testimony of the respect I have long entertained for your character, while at the same time, I trust I shall be gratifying myself by the acquisition of having, as a near neighbour, a friend I so truly regard. Mr. Price, the rector of Knebworth, is lately dead, by which circumstance the presentation of that living devolves on me. Need I say, after this, how happy it will make me if it should meet your views and wishes respecting your son, Mr. James Hesse, whose amiable character and sincere attention to the sacred duties of his profession, will, I flatter myself, prove a happy contrast to the conduct which both myself and the parish have had to lament of the late incumbent. And believe me, with every good wish to yourself and family, my dear Mrs. Hesse, &c.

"Oct. 9th, 1830."

10. Pleaded payment of rent on 15th of May, 1831, to the Rev. J. L. Hesse for all the pasture glebe; his acts of ownership therein, and payment by him of poor rate for the same.

11. Exhibited a statement of rent signed on the part of the tenant by his son, and a receipt for poor rates.

12. Trespass on the 1st of June, 1831, by Kelly, [672] as Mrs. Lytton's agent, in the cow-pasture; action, and service of notice.

13. That the Rev. J. L. Hesse's first communication with Mrs. Lytton, or any person on her behalf, was at Knebworth on the 23d of October; and that he had no interview with her or Kelly, unless in the presence of O. Hesse and G. B. Hesse, who heard every conversation that passed.

14. That the suit was the suit of Mrs. Lytton, and not of the churchwardens, her tenants.

Upon the publication of the evidence on these pleas an allegation exceptive to the testimony of O. Hesse was given in by the promoters; it pleaded in exception to his answers on the 12th, 21st, 30th, 22d, 23d, 24th interrogatories; to his deposition on the 9th article and 19th and 20th interrogatories.

"I swear that I did not previous to nor at the time of my son's induction to Knebworth declare that it was my intention to reside with my wife at Knebworth rectory: I did not point out the alterations I intended to make or cause to be made in the rectory house and grounds: I pointed out such alterations as I thought it required."

"That on the 25th of October O. Hesse informed Briggs at Knebworth that he (O. Hesse) intended to alter the rectory house by changing the back into a front, asked Briggs' advice as to laying a ploughed field at the back of the rectory down in grass, the probable expence thereof, and as to the proper season; and said it was his intention to remove a hedge which divided the field from the garden."

[673] "I did on the 25th of October say to the interrogate, Thompson, that he held more offices than he ought; and that it was incompatible to hold the offices of churchwarden, parish clerk, and constable; but I did not make use of such terms as 'Aye, I shall have all these things altered; I will have no person holding more offices than one, and I must have this set right in vestry:' I used no words to that effect."

"That on the 25th [in the presence of the Rev. J. Hesse, Kelly, and Briggs] O. Hesse said to Thompson, 'It is very improper to have you holding so many offices: I shall have all these things corrected: no person shall hold more offices than one in this parish, and I shall speak to the bishop's secretary on the subject.'"

"I did not at any time authorize Kelly to make a new road across Knebworth Park to the church; and I certainly did not say to Kelly, 'Let it be done by all means, and say nothing about it, it will be an acquisition to the church:' I said nothing to Kelly to that effect. On the day on which I went with Kelly to see the intended new church-path my sons were within three or four yards of us; but I did not give directions to have that path made, for I referred Kelly to my son James, and turned round to my son to answer for himself."

"That immediately after O. Hesse had addressed himself to Thompson, as in the next preceding article, he, O. Hesse, the Rev. J. L. Hesse, Kelly, Thompson, and Briggs were walking towards the rectory; Kelly said to Rev. J. Hesse, 'Now, as Briggs is here, who is to make the new road to the church, we will point it out and hear your opinion of it;' to which Rev. J. L. Hesse [674] made no reply, but went on to the rectory. That O. Hesse then said to Kelly, 'Let us go and look at it;' and that while looking at it O. Hesse said, 'Let it be done by all means, and say nothing about it; it will be much better for the church:' that G. B. Hesse was not present nor in sight on these occasions."

"I did in October, after my son's induction, apply to the former rector's son upon the subject of dilapidations: my son, who was leaving town, asked me to write a note. I have no recollection of the name of Jackson, nor that I applied to any such person on the subject of the furniture and fixtures belonging to the former rector. A Mr. Jackson may have written me a letter and I may have returned him an answer, but I have no recollection of the circumstance, or of having refused to correspond with any such person on the ground that there was no legal personal representative of the late rector." "I did not apply to Kelly, but in October, or thereabouts, Kelly wrote to me to inform me that some person had been to the rectory about the fixtures and that he had refused to part with the keys, and I answered that he had done very right: I forget the terms of the notes, but I gave no order in the matter: I have no recollection of having made any complaint that my hands were tied, and that I could not proceed in adjusting the amount due to my son, because I could not obtain an answer from Mr. Price."

Pleaded and exhibited two letters (1 and 2).(a)[1]

[675] "I did not authorize Kelly to purchase a stack of hay standing on the rectory premises for the use of my son, the producent, nor for my own use: I never authorized him to do any thing of the kind. Mr. Sherrington wrote to me to say that Kelly had told him I should want the hay: my answer was, that I had supposed I should pay my son a visit at Knebworth and that I might want the hay, but things had so turned out that I did not want it, that I had never given Kelly any authority on the subject, but if there was any misunderstanding about it, I would give Sherrington 2l. sooner than he should lose through it: I [676] told him he might sell the hay or do what he liked with it. I never desired to know what quantity of hay there was, that I recollect; but what I said was in writing, and it may be produced to shew what I did say. I do not remember the date of my letter to Sherrington, and I have no recollection of having said in it that as there was no personal representative of the late rector of Knebworth, the hay could not be legally sold, but I may have said so."

The above answer was contradicted at length and with minuteness, detailing interviews, conversations, and negotiations at Knebworth on the 23rd of October between O. Hesse, Kelly, and Sherrington, in respect to the stack of hay, and exhibited two letters (3 and 4).(a)[2]

"I looked upon the preparation of the lease as a measure merely to pacify Mrs.

(a)[1] No. 1.

"Mr. Hesse's compliments to Mr. Kelly, begs to acquaint him that he has searched the office in Doctors' Commons, where as yet Mr. Price's will has not been brought. . . . This prevents Mr. H. doing any thing about the dilapidations, though he has consulted Mr. Harrison, the surveyor, . . . who will be in readiness to come the moment Mr. H. can find out from the Commons the representative of Mr. Price. Mr. H. begs Mr. K. to make his best compliments to Mrs. B. Lytton.

"5 Fig Tree Court, Temple, 29th Oct. 1830."

No. 2.

"Mr. Hesse presents his compliments to Mr. Kelly, returns his thanks for Mr. Jackson's letter, but according to what he understands, few if any of the articles mentioned are fixtures which Mr. Price can sell or take away from the rectory; but Mr. K. will be surprised to hear, that after writing to Mr. P. upon the subject of the dilapidations, and waiting a fortnight, Mr. P. has not condescended to give any answer, nor has he proved a will or taken out administration, which entirely ties up Mr. H.'s hands. Mr. H. has therefore written to Mr. Jackson, that whenever a personal representative appears, he will be ready to enter into the question mentioned in Mr. J.'s letter, as well as any other, so as to come to an amicable and final arrangement, but that nothing must be removed from the premises. Mr. H. will therefore be obliged to Mr. K. not to give the key of the house to any one. Mr. H. begs Mr. K. to present his respectful compliments to Mrs. B. Lytton, and tell her how ill Mr. P. is behaving. I am not sure if there are not some potatoes in the rectory garden: if there are, may I beg the favour of you to give them to the most deserving of the poor who will dig them up: it would be a pity to let them be wasted.

"Temple, 11th November. "L. H."

(a)[2] No. 3.

"Mr. Hesse has received Mr. Sherrington's letter, and begs to say that things have turned out so as to make it unlikely he will want the hay; if therefore he can sell it to any body else, Mr. H. will be much obliged to him. Mr. H. does not know from Mr. Sherrington's letter the quantity of hay, or how it is reckoned.

"Temple, 12th January, 1831."

No. 4.

"5 Fig Tree Court, 22d January, 1831.

"Mr. Hesse is very sorry for any misunderstanding about the hay, but he never authorized Mr. Kelly to give 28l. or any other sum for it, and when he came to understand that there was no representative of Mr. Price, and that therefore no Lytton at the [677] time, and not as a measure which was ever to be carried into effect." "When I informed my son, who was with me at Burrington, of the draft lease, he refused to execute it: he said he would never put his hand to it, nor to any thing."

"I do not imagine that Mr. Lake expected that such a lease would be executed: from what passed between him and me I do not believe that he expected that such a lease would be executed." "This skeleton of a lease was first submitted to the producent for his approval on or about the 26th of November, and he refused at once, the moment he had read it, to put his hand to any thing of the kind: and soon after (perhaps a week) I wrote to Lake to tell him that my son would not put his hand to the lease." "I am not sure that I went on to say that it could not be expected that my son should stir in the business. If I did say so, I meant that he could not be expected to execute the lease, for it was in the same letter (and the letter, if produced, will speak for itself) in which I communicated to Lake my son's refusal to execute the lease."

That O. Hesse never wrote to or informed Lake that the producent had refused to sign a lease of the purport or effect of the draft lease: and recited a letter from Lake to O. Hesse, and exhibited two letters (Nos. 5 and 6) from O. Hesse to Lake.(a) person could sell the hay, he gave up the idea of purchasing it; and Mr. Hesse will not authorize Mr. Sherrington to sell it on his account, as it never was his, and Mr. Sherrington himself has no title to it, nor the auctioneer to sell it: rather than give Mr. Sherrington any trouble unnecessarily about it, Mr. H. will give him 2l., as there has been a misunderstanding about it, but he cannot admit that he ever purchased the hay."

---

(a) No. 5.

"Burrington, 4th Dec. 1830.

"Dear Sir,"—[After acknowledging the receipt of his letter of the 24th ult. and stating he was sure his son would do any thing for Mrs. Lytton's "convenience or comfort that was not against his own character and against propriety;"] "my son has taken most precise and strong oaths, which sit heavy upon him, and make him so cautious of moving that I fear he will not be prevailed upon to put his hand to any thing: he has been cautioned, has taken advice, and will take much more upon the subject. I have well considered the subject, and I am quite satisfied that in no case would it be proper to execute the deed you have submitted. . . . Nothing must be done that would bear the semblance or colour of shift and contrivance, as the law expresses it, to make it of advantage to the patron. Though the penalty is more fatal to the one party, it is equally bearing upon both. . . . I am perfectly aware of all that has passed, and it makes the matter more difficult, with the best intentions in the world, but precipitancy is what on all sides must be prevented. My son has neither seen your letter nor the deed, nor has he seen or known, nor will he ever, as I thoroughly believe, hear of the contents of this letter to you.

"When I last saw you and Mr. Kelly, it was promised that the terriers should be sent. I believe that they belong to the incumbent, and as my son cannot stir without the knowledge they contain, I shall be greatly obliged to you for them.—Dear sir, yours very faithfully, "L. HESSE."

In a postscript he referred to certain reports (then current in the neighbourhood of Burrington) that though his son had got Knebworth it was only nominal, and added, "These rumours so much alarm my son and all his family, that it cannot be expected he will stir in the business."

"December 8.

"Dear Sir,—I cannot help expressing great surprise at the contents of your letter of the 4th instant, after every thing having been settled and agreed upon relative to the lease of the tithes, except the amount of rent, which I understood you were to have ascertained ere this with Kelly's assistance: I therefore request the return of the draft lease, with your observations thereon. The rumours alluded to in your letter are in my opinion to be altogether disregarded."

No. 6.

"Burrington, 12 Dec. 1830.

"Dear Sir,—I beg to say, in answer to your letter of the 8th, that the second time I saw you, when I produced the book with one of the oaths in it, I told you no promise [678] Lushington and Haggard in opposition to the exceptive allegation. The question is whether the exceptions are [679] pertinent to the issue. We fully admit the importance of the witness excepted to; but almost the whole of this allegation has not the slightest reference to the issue which the Court is about to try. We deny that the matter is even collateral, because, were it collateral, that would be to admit in some degree that it was connected with the cause. The principles on which exceptive allegations are usually admitted are well known. 1st. The alleged contradiction must import wilful and corrupt perjury. 2dly. The matters alleged must be such as neither have been nor could have been pleaded before. 3dly. They must be important and have a bearing on the issue in the cause. The rule at common law is the same in this latter respect, even though the witness to contradict is producible at the time (Spencely v. De Willott, 7 East, 108). All these ob-[680]-jections apply to different parts of this exceptive allegation. Besides, the contradictions are in themselves trifling, and, if proved, could not affect the credit of the witness.

The King's advocate and Addams contrà. The witness has given a colouring to his evidence: the question is whether, looking to his evidence, this allegation is pertinent? The main issue is whether there was a corrupt presentation through the agency of O. Hesse: whatever, then, tends to connect him as agent is pertinent. He must have seen that the drift of the interrogatories was to affirm his agency: his own acts and letters are in contradiction to his evidence. The question will ultimately depend on the relative credit of the witnesses on either side: if the contents of the exceptive allegation are sufficient to detract from this witness, the allegation must be received. Some of the exceptions certainly are not of the most stringent character; but much depends on the accuracy of the witness' memory, and, so far at least, the exceptive allegation is relevant, because it shews great infirmity of memory on his part.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl [after stating the general history of the parties, the substance of the articles, and of the defensive allegation]. What is the true issue in the cause? The suit is for simony, or simoniacal promotion: it is a criminal suit, to be strictly proceeded in. The issue is whether the defendant, either by himself or by [681] any other person, made any contract or promise to procure the presentation. If any promise were made with his privity, he would be guilty of simony; if any promise were made without his privity, he would be simoniacally promoted. The private intention of the patroness before the presentation, to get this lease after, would not, unaccompanied by any antecedent promise, either by or on behalf of the presentee, affect the validity of his possession. The true issue is, what was done before the presentation; for unless some simoniacal promise at that time is proved, no conviction can take place in this suit. What passed after presentation, institution, and induction, may tend to shew that there was a previous corrupt bargain; but, in order to have weight, these subsequent facts must bear that inference strongly. The point now attempted to be raised is whether the father of the defendant has answered truly such questions as were properly put to him; for I apprehend that if irrelevant questions have been put, the party cannot go into contradictions to such evidence, in order to discredit this single witness. It is true he is a material witness; this, however, must be remembered, that neither the defendant has been afraid to subject the father to, nor has the father shrunk from undergoing, a searching cross-examination.

---

whatever could be made by me for my son, to which you answered, 'certainly not, but that I could represent to him:' and I wish this to be kept in remembrance. When I saw you last, I admit a lease was to be drawn for consideration, and that I said 'every thing that was for Mrs. Bulwer's comfort and convenience that was proper would be done.' This was all I meant to do, and all I did do, even if it had been for myself; but for another, and that other never having heard one syllable of the subject, it was all I could do; and be it remembered that my son is not in leading-strings and will think for himself: but as yet I have not made up my mind that the thing proposed is proper to be done, and I know one thing which passed at our last meeting which was a condemnation of precipitancy in a case like the delicate one this is. It will be necessary for me to have an account shewing the name of each farm or property on which tithes are paid, name of the landlord, name of the tenant, computed number of acres, rent, tithes paid for the last three years, before I can proceed further in the business, with a proposal of the sum at which Mrs. Bulwer wishes to have the rent of the tithes settled.—I am yours obediently, "L. HESSE."

The 9th, 10th, and 11th articles, of which I will first dispose, are directed to prove that Mr. O. Hesse has deposed untruly in stating that the lease was not intended, and that Mr. Lake did not expect it to take effect, but that it was only prepared in order to quiet Mrs. Lytton. A statement, however, to the effect of Mr. Hesse's evidence had [682] appeared in the defensive allegation, and this contradiction, therefore, if important, should have been made before publication. Besides, exclusive of the letters, how is it possible to prove what were Mr. Hesse's intentions, or what Mr. Lake expected? The letters are not admissible in exception to the witness' credit, but may be brought in as the best evidence of the facts to which the cross-examination refers.

The first eight articles relate to the conduct of the father after the presentation and induction, which does not bear upon the issue: the facts, too, are perfectly equivocal. Suppose the father had admitted all of them as pleaded; they would not tend to shew that a simoniacal contract had been entered into on the part of the father or on the part of the son. The interrogatories go to collateral, incidental, and equivocal matter. The rule is, that you cannot cross-examine to matter not bearing on the issue, and then contradict it by other evidence in order to discredit the witness (Spencely v. De Willott, 7 East, 108): nor, if a witness answers such irrelevant question before it is disallowed or withdrawn, can evidence afterwards be admitted to contradict his testimony on the collateral matter.(b) "In the application of this rule of cross-examination," says Mr. Phillipps, "the principal thing to be considered will be, whether the question is irrelevant to the points in issue between the parties." Thus, "to inquire of a witness on cross-examination whether he had not attempted to dissuade another witness from being present at the trial, has been held to be so [683] far immaterial to the issue, that if the witness answer in the negative, evidence to contradict him would not be admissible" (1 Phillipps on Evid. 259. Harris v. Tippet, 2 Camp. 637).

It is a loose and dangerous practice to introduce masses of interrogatories not relevant to the point at issue. The Court cannot stop the practice in any individual case, for it does not see the interrogatories till after the evidence has been taken; but it can prevent attempts to discredit a witness by means of exceptive allegations contradicting answers to such irrelevant questions. If this exceptive allegation were admitted, six or seven new issues would be introduced, and this in a criminal suit. I am bound in justice to reject this allegation; but if the parties desire it, they are entitled to bring in all the letters referred to in the 9th, 10th, and 11th articles; the witness having in his evidence referred to their contents.

Allegation rejected.

By-Day.—The letters were brought in, and the cause came on for argument on the next session.

The King's advocate and Addams for the promoters. It depends on the credit of Kelly and Lake on the one side, and of Obadiah and George Hesse on the other, whether it is established that O. Hesse, the father of the defendant, agreed, previous to the presentation, to accept the living, subject to the modus and lease of the tithes: it therefore is a question of credit, and subsequent acts are explanatory of the previous understand-[684]-ing. Though we are not prepared to say that the privity of the son is made out, yet on proof of a simoniacal contract the Court must pronounce that the defendant has been simoniacally promoted, and that the presentation is void. The proceedings in their present form are regular; for since the passing of the 31 Eliz. c. 6, the criminal jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical Court is alone preserved by the statute. Watson (Clergyman's Law, p. 46), after reciting sec. 9 of the statute, says, "Therefore the Ecclesiastical Court may proceed against a simonist, pro salute animæ, and deprive him for that cause (Smith v. Shelbourn, Cro. Eliz. 685), though he was not privy to the contract, because there be not any accessories in simony." Baker v. Rogers, Cro. Eliz. 789. The st. 1 W. and M. c. 16 speaks of a person simoniacally promoted being convicted of such an offence in an Ecclesiastical Court.

Per Curiam. Does that hold, whether the incumbent was privy or not? As it is not contended that privity is in this case established, what is the incumbent's offence? The living may be void, but there is no reason why the innocent presentee should be punished. The Crown, in order to present to a void living, requires no declaratory sentence. How does it appear that before the statute of Eliz. the Ecclesiastical Court could proceed criminally against a party simoniacè promotus? It may not, however, be necessary to determine the point of law, as possibly there may be no proof of a simoniacal contract, even without the defendant's privity.

(b) Harris v. Tippet, 2 Camp. 638. Rex v. Watson, 2 Starkie's Cases, 151, et seq.

[685] Lushington and Haggard contrà. Our absolute proposition is that an incumbent cannot be prosecuted by articles by reason of being simoniacally promoted. A proceeding by articles is a criminal suit: the sentence prayed is a punishment on the individual, though coincident with the protection of the public interest by preventing the repetition of the offence. The proceeding is for "his soul's health and the lawful correction of his manners;" and the prayer is, "that he ought to be canonically corrected and punished." Simoniacal promotion, however, is ex vi termini a disavowal of guilt in the incumbent; a transaction which precludes the possibility of guilt on his part; for it denotes a corrupt transaction in which the incumbent is not concurrent, and of which he had no knowledge, and is a term used in direct opposition to simoniacus. It is contrary to every principle of justice to proceed criminally against a man when he is innocent of all crime.

But the case is not without its remedy: there is a power vested in the Crown. In the case of the living of Hilgay, in Norfolk, a simoniacè promotus was, a few years since, ousted on a quare impedit brought on behalf of a person subsequently presented by the Crown. Perhaps the question might be raised here by the Crown, or, possibly, even by a churchwarden praying a declaratory sentence. No instance of such a proceeding as the present can at any time be found. Even where absolute simony is charged, the jurisdiction is almost obsolete. An authority from Watson has been cited; but the reason there given, "that there are no accessories in simony," does not justify the conclusion; it cannot make [686] an innocent man a principal, it only makes all who are guilty principals. The writer, Mr. Place, was not a civilian, and very possibly confounded the course of proceeding.

Per Curiam. In Baker v. Rogers, one of the cases cited in Watson, the party was found a simonist. How can there be accessories in simony? If the presentee is cognizant of the simony when presented, or subsequently does any act in furtherance of the simoniacal contract, is he not a principal? If he be not cognizant when presented, nor subsequently adopts the contract, can he be an accessory? Suppose a previous contract, but without the previous knowledge of the presentee; suppose after induction he is informed of and executes that contract, would not that be simony per se?

Argument resumed.

That, we apprehend, would depend on what was done after the induction: but in the absence of all credible evidence to shew that, if any agreement was at any time made, the defendant ever adopted, ratified, or acted upon it, he clearly cannot be considered as a principal, nor indeed as an accessory; for Blackstone (vol. iv. pp. 35, 6, 7) speaks of accessories as persons who being cognizant of the offence do something in furtherance of it: and in East's P. C. p. 35, tit. "Simony," there is nothing to induce a belief that simony is, in this respect, distinguished from other offences. It is therefore utterly impossible to make the defendant, either as principal or accessory, liable to penalties or to ecclesiastical censures. If this objection is sound, then it is fatal to the whole suit.

[687] As to the proof of the charge. Kelly is in fact the only witness, yet, in Mrs. Lytton's scheme for obtaining a corrupt advantage from this presentation, Kelly was an accomplice, and has been guilty of something like an attempt at subornation of perjury. If he had induced the defendant to sign the contract he would have induced him to commit perjury.(a) To what credit, then, is Kelly entitled? His moral guilt is as great as if the contract had been signed and sealed. Conviction of subornation of perjury, or of other offences which involve the charge of falsehood and affect the public administration of justice, renders a witness incompetent. 1 Phillipps on Evid. 27.

The King's advocate and Addams in reply. The legal objection is, at the least, taken at an inconvenient time. The law was set forth in our first article: the objection should have been taken at the admission of the articles.

Lushington. We were not bound to take the objection at an earlier period: it is often advisable for a defendant, both in a criminal and a civil suit, to allow the other party to take his own course. Even after a conviction at common law a prisoner may offer any exceptions to the indictment in arrest of judgment, and if the objection is valid, the whole proceeding is set aside. 4 Bl. Com. 375.

(a) See canon 40, cited 4 Burn, Ecc. Law, tit. Simony.

Continuation of reply. The defendant in his allegation has pro tanto admitted the law to be as we have laid it, because [688] in answer to our first article he does not allege that if simoniacally promoted he is not deprivable under this form of proceeding, but that, in fact, he has not been simoniacally promoted.

It is not denied that before the statute the Court might proceed to deprive either criminally or civilly. The statute reserves the criminal jurisdiction. It has been acted upon in Dobie v. Masters, 3 Phill. 171; and Oughton, t. 4, s. 9, says a party may be proceeded against either criminally or civilly: but no instance is mentioned of a suit in a civil form. In Baker v. Rogers, Cro. Eliz. 788, there was no privity. The proceedings, as stated in Watson, were pro salute animæ, though the party was simoniacè promotus: and the doctrine in Watson may be true, though the reason assigned be incorrect. Gibson, p. 801, says that by the civil and canon law simoniacè promotus may be deprived, though not (as simoniacus) disabled to take another benefice: and that under the statute he is not disabled from being presented again to the same benefice.(a)[1] But he speaks of the ancient ecclesiastical laws against simony and of the powers of the Spiritual Court as remaining entire notwithstanding the statute. Degge (p. 50), and all the authorities cited by him, are in accordance with the statute, treating the clerk as guilty of an offence. In 12 Rep. p. 101, Lord Coke says, "The law intendeth to inflict punishment upon the patron and upon the incumbent, although he never knew of the corrupt contract." The statute 1 W. and M. c. 16, which also recognizes the ecclesias-[689]-tical jurisdiction, speaks of simony as a "crime," "an offence," and the parties as "guilty of a crime."

Per Curiam. It speaks of the joint act of the patron and incumbent as a crime; but does it speak of a simoniacè promotus as a criminal or an offender?

Argument resumed.

The oath taken at the time of institution necessarily calls for caution; and the absence of caution in neglecting to make inquiry under circumstances like the present constitutes an offence. Even not resigning is a crime, as soon as the presentee is informed or suspects that there has been a simoniacal agreement.

Per Curiam. The oath does not require the incumbent to resign.

Argument resumed.

This, like many other criminal proceedings in the Ecclesiastical Court, is only criminal in form. The suit in Bliss v. Woods (supra, 486) was substantially a civil proceeding; and the Court in that case considered the words "for the soul's health and the lawful correction of his manners" as mere form.

Hilary Term, 1st Session.—Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. This is a criminal suit brought by the churchwardens of Knebworth against the incumbent of that parish for simony.

The case having been argued at the latter end of [690] last term, a considerable interval has since elapsed; the suit is of an unusual nature; the Court is not assisted by precedents in the adjudication of it; a question of great importance, at least to the character and interests of the defendant, is involved: all these circumstances impose on the Court the duty of stating its opinion more fully than is its ordinary practice.

In the citation, and also in the præsertim of the articles, the words "for having been corruptly and simoniacally presented" are thrown in,(a)[2] but apparently rather as completing the averment of "being privy to a corrupt and simoniacal procurement" than as a distinct and substantive charge; so that it is hardly discoverable from the præsertim that the party proceeded against is accused of being guilty of two separate offences, viz., of simony and of being simoniacally presented without his privity and knowledge. That point will require further consideration in the course of my judgment.

The articles allege a variety of facts, and throughout aver the defendant's privity. It will be necessary to state the leading and most important articles. [The Court

---

(a)[1] See the citation and præsertim, supra, 659.

(a)[2] In Booth v. Potter, Cro. Jac. 533, it is holden that the party so simoniacally promoted could never be presented to the same benefice again. So per Dodderidge and Cook in Rex v. Bp. of Norwich, 1 Roll. Rep. 237. S. C. Cro. Jac. 385, where the dictum is omitted.

here read the substance of the first nine articles, vide supra, p. 660—and proceeded.] That is what is stated to have passed on the 12th and 16th of October. The articles then detail subsequent circumstances not immediately connected with the charge of simony, such as the preparation of the instruments of presentation and the like, and the twenty-second article is to the following effect:—"That by reason of the premises, you have corruptly and simoniacally procured or [691] accepted the rectory of Knebworth, and that the same hath, with your privity and consent, been corruptly and simoniacally procured or obtained for you and accepted by you, and that you have been corruptly and simoniacally presented to the said rectory, and that you ought to be canonically corrected and punished according to the exigency of the law;" and the concluding article prays that the defendant should be so punished and corrected.

Here, then, in these several articles is a complete charge of simony, both against the patroness and against the incumbent. The patroness, by her agent, proposes a simoniacal agreement; the father of the incumbent, acting as his agent and with his privity, consents first, on the 12th of October, to accept the living on that condition; the agreement is confirmed and renewed on the 16th, before the presentation to the living is signed; and for this conduct, if the charge is proved, the defendant is liable, as prayed, to be canonically punished.

An allegation on the part of the defendant first generally denies and contradicts the charges; and secondly, gives a very different representation of the interviews of the 12th and the 16th of October, before the presentation. The first article contains the general denial. The second shews the nature of the defence.

[The Court here read the second article of the defensive allegation. Vide supra, pp. 665-8.]

This, then, is the defence set up. A conversation passes concerning the intention of Mrs. Lytton to present to the living. George Hesse, the brother of the defendant, was also present at this interview. Kelly delivers a paper merely setting forth the value of the living, Mr. Obadiah [692] Hesse looks at it cursorily; he had no knowledge of any decree respecting the modus; there was no stipulation whatever to take the presentation on the condition of recognizing the modus, as charged in the articles; and there was no mention of any modus, so far at least as Obadiah Hesse heard; the article, in short, denies and contradicts the whole of the important particulars stated to have passed on the 12th of October: it denies that any agreement was entered into by Obadiah Hesse, and of course therefore Mr. James Hesse's privity to or knowledge of any such agreement.

[The Court then, in contradiction to what was alleged in the articles to have passed on the 16th of October, read the fourth article of the defensive allegation, supra, p. 669: and stated that it was further pleaded that the defendant was at Burrington on the 12th and 16th of October; that he did not come to town till the 19th, and that on the 23rd he was inducted into the living.]

Though there are some other subordinate circumstances, this statement of the articles, and of the allegation in contradiction to them, furnishes a general outline of the charges and the defence, and the Court will now proceed to consider, first, whether the charge of simony against the defendant is proved, viz. a corrupt promise with his privity; secondly, whether any simoniacal promise or agreement was made without his knowledge, in consideration of which he was presented to the living, that is, whether he was simoniacally promoted; and thirdly, whether, if he was so simoniacally promoted without his privity or knowledge, a sentence of deprivation can be engrafted on this criminal suit.

[693] As to the first point, whether the defendant has been proved guilty of simony, there seems to be no difficulty. It is hardly possible that the Court can avoid pronouncing that the proof has totally failed in this respect; it can scarcely be considered that any proof whatever of privity has been offered: and yet it is a sort of case on which the proof should be clear—in which there should be no doubt. In the first place, it is a criminal proceeding, and in all criminal proceedings the presumption is in favour of innocence, and the evidence of guilt should be clear, or, in the words of Blackstone, "Where there is a possibility of a transaction being fair, the law will not suppose it iniquitous without proof" (2 Bl. Com. 280). In the next place, it is a crime of no light character; not only by the ecclesiastical law, but by the common law, it is held to be a crime most highly odious, and especially in a clergyman, since, as Lord Coke observes, it involves the crime of perjury. "Simony is odious in the eye of the common law." "It is the more odious because it is ever accompanied by perjury, for the presentee is sworn to commit no simony" (3 Inst. 156). "Simony hath always by the law of God and of the land been accounted a great offence" (Cro. Car. 353). And it is very well known that every clergyman takes a solemn oath before his diocesan that there has been nothing promised to be done or undertaken by or for him, and that he will not perform any such promise made without his knowledge. Such is the magnitude of the offence charged. The consequences of simony are also very serious under the statute of Elizabeth. The living is void; the presentation [694] devolves to the Crown; and the guilty presentee is incapacitated, and liable to a penalty of two years' full value of the living.

Thus stands the offence charged and its consequences, in case there has been any simoniacal promise made by or with the privity of the defendant. The crime however must be proved against him. What, then, is the evidence to prove it? To what passed on the 12th October, Kelly is the only witness. To what took place on the 16th October Lake is the only witness. At the interview on the 12th, Obadiah Hesse, the father of the defendant, and George Hesse, the brother, were both present; and at that of the 16th, Lake and Obadiah Hesse were alone present. The proof, therefore, on the first point—the charge of simony against the defendant—as well as on the second point, will depend upon the result of the evidence of these persons. The whole of the transaction itself (not gainsaid on either side) goes strongly to acquit the defendant of privity, and therefore of actual simony.

Mrs. Lytton's letters, announcing her intention to present James Hesse to the living, are dated on the 9th October, and delivered to Obadiah Hesse, at his son's chambers, on the morning of the 12th. It is not suggested that James Hesse, or Obadiah Hesse, or any of the family, had any idea or expectation of this presentation, or that any application had been previously made to Mrs. Lytton. The defendant was on the 12th at Burrington, 12 or 14 miles below Bristol. The letter to Mrs. Hesse was not forwarded till the evening of the 12th, and was not received at Burrington till the 13th or 14th. Frederick Hesse, another son of Obadiah Hesse, has been examined: he was, at [695] the time the letter arrived, undergoing a surgical operation at Burrington, and he deposes:

"My mother was then residing at Burrington, and I remember her receiving a letter from Mrs. Lytton at that time, but I cannot say whether it was the 13th, 14th, or 15th day of the month, but it was about that time. I was at Burrington and underwent an operation on the very day the letter was received. I read the letter on the day it was received. The letter, marked B, produced to me, is that letter, and I believe the first communication my brother had of the contents of it was in my bed room, and almost at the very instant the operation I underwent was about to be performed, when my sister came into the room and said, 'James you have got another living.' Until that I never heard the subject mentioned by any person, and I am convinced that until then my brother had no idea of his having been presented to Knebworth, or that there was a prospect of his being presented to it. I do not recollect the precise day afterwards on which my brother went to London, but I believe it was on the following Monday." The following Monday was the 18th; and it appears that James Hesse arrived in town on the 19th.

Then, according to this statement, the presentee could not, by possibility, be privy to what passed on the 12th, and scarcely on the 16th. There is no trace of it nor any reason to suspect it. The mandate is dated the 21st October; he carries the presentation to the bishop the same day, and on the 23d he is inducted to the living, and then his legal possession was complete. On these facts and on this evidence it is impossible for the Court to pronounce the defendant guilty of the crime of [696] simony, and to subject him to all the consequences of such a conviction. If he had subsequently done any act confirmatory of a simoniacal promotion, I will not say whether it would not have amounted to simony: it certainly would have been a violation of his oath, by which he had sworn not to satisfy or perform any promise made without his knowledge: but here the fact fails; the defendant has not executed any lease, or acquiesced in any modus, or let or exchanged the cow-pasture meadow with Mrs. Lytton; a circumstance to which I shall hereafter advert. Much pains have been taken to prove that his father was his agent: but in what way? He was not authorized to this act, not even by implication, and a person cannot commit a crime by an unauthorized agent. If he had employed his father to solicit and procure this living, engaging beforehand to ratify whatever his father might do or agree to do, then there might be some colour for the charge, and it might be simony: but he was perfectly ignorant of the whole transaction, whatever it may be. On the first point then, whether Mr. James Hesse is guilty of simony, I am of opinion that the defendant is fully acquitted, and that if nothing comes out to affect him on the other point, he is entitled to be dismissed, and with his costs.

I proceed now to consider the second point, whether the defendant has been proved to have been simoniacally promoted without his knowledge and privity. The proof upon this point should be no less clear than on the other; for though it might not affect in the same serious manner the moral character of the defendant, it would operate with great severity on his pecuniary interests, [697] as the living would be void under the statute, and the Crown would acquire the right to present. Whether this jurisdiction in this suit could proceed to deprivation is the third point for the Court to consider. At present I am only considering whether there is evidence that the defendant has been simoniacè promotus; whether the arrangement charged to have taken place between Kelly and Obadiah Hesse, on the 12th and on the 16th October, is or is not proved. The proof depends principally on the evidence of Kelly on the fifth article, opposed to the evidence of the two Hesses; and on the evidence of Lake on the ninth article, opposed to the evidence of Obadiah Hesse. The credit of the witnesses on both sides has been much commented upon in the argument; and undoubtedly this is one of those unpleasant causes, in which the Court must examine, and in some degree pronounce, on the credit due to the respective witnesses; for it seems scarcely possible to reconcile (which the Court is always anxious to do, if it can) the testimony of the defendant's with those of the promoters' witnesses. It is necessary, therefore, to consider the credit of the witnesses; the burden of proof, however, rests with the promoters—if the truth remains doubtful, they fail.

The promoters' first and principal witness is Kelly: a single witness to the most important part of the case, the interview on the 12th of October. Kelly's history of himself is, that he was formerly a writing clerk in the office of Lake, and, as such, had the management of Mrs. Lytton's suit with the late incumbent of Knebworth. In March, 1829, whilst he was at Mr. Lake's office, a decision of the Court of Chancery against the [698] modus set up by Mrs. Lytton was given. About that period Kelly became the steward and agent of Mrs. Lytton. He had then some knowledge of law, and was intimately acquainted with the concerns of Mrs. Lytton. He knew well the value of the tithes attempted to be covered by the modus, and the invalidity of that modus. Perhaps, also, it may be presumed that he was not altogether ignorant of the statute of Elizabeth, and the law of simony. He admits that he has advised and suggested and recommended this suit; that he has furnished the information and facts of the case; that Mrs. Lytton is answerable for the costs of the suit; that the promoters, the churchwardens, are her tenants, and that he, as her steward, requested them to permit their names to be used in the suit. He deposes in these terms in answer to the fifth interrogatory:

"I (Kelly) cannot say I have not suggested this suit, because I have recommended it, and I have taken a part in it by giving information of the different facts and circumstances within my knowledge. I do not know it, but I should believe that Mrs. Lytton, of whom I have deposed, is responsible for the expenses of this suit. The promoters are her tenants; but they have not instituted these proceedings at the request, or the suggestion, or by the desire of Mrs. Lytton. I have had numerous conversations with Mrs. Lytton on the subject of these proceedings, but no meeting expressly with her respecting them. I am her agent and steward, and I have taken an active part in promoting this cause, and I requested the aforesaid John Whish and Samuel Woollatt to permit their names to be used therein. Counsel having advised that the proceedings should be [699] in their names, I applied to them accordingly. I have had, previous to the institution of this suit, many communications with Mrs. Lytton with respect to the proceedings to be taken against the Rev. James Hesse, and counsel have been consulted in respect thereto; and under their advice, and with her sanction and privity, the present suit has been commenced, but not in pursuance of what I have settled and arranged with her: we have acted under the advice and direction of counsel."

From this account, then, of the part that Kelly has taken in the suit, it is hardly possible to conceive a more biassed witness, or one coming nearer to being a party in the cause, nor one whose evidence could be less safely relied on. He deposes: "I was the bearer of the letter in which Mrs. Lytton communicated her intention to present James Hesse to the rectory of Knebworth. Mrs. Lytton communicated the contents of it to me, as well as of another letter inclosed in it; the one was directed to Obadiah Hesse, the father; and the other to Mrs. Hesse, the mother. I delivered them to Obadiah Hesse on the 12th of October, 1830. I made a minute of the day afterwards from entries made in my accounts on the same day. I had some conversation with Obadiah Hesse at the time on the subject of the presentation, and the terms on which it was to be made."

It is proper here to see what are the contents of the letters, and what were the terms held out by Mrs. Lytton, for they are the origin and foundation of the whole transaction and interview. [The Court here read the letters A and B, see supra, 668 (a).]

The letter to Mrs. Hesse is important: a more [700] kind warm-hearted letter can hardly be imagined, or more fit considerations for the presentation. She expresses for the mother grateful sentiments of kindness and affection, rejoicing that she has an opportunity to shew how sensibly those sentiments were felt on her part—she offers the living as a testimony of the respect she has long entertained for her character; and as to her son, she dwells on his "amiable character, and sincere atttachment to the sacred duties of his profession:" in short, if sincere, nothing could be more proper, or more to Mrs. Lytton's credit, than the contents of this letter.

It is really difficult, on the single testimony of Kelly, to attribute to Mrs. Lytton the baseness and fraudulent contrivance with which this letter must have been written if Kelly tells the truth. It is the more difficult to suppose these letters insincere, because their truth seems conformable with the history of the parties. Lake has heard Mrs. Lytton speak of Mrs. Hesse as an old acquaintance.

Mr. and Mrs. Hesse lived, some years ago, at Bishop Wearmouth; the defendant was curate of that parish, and resided with his family. The rector of Bishop Wearmouth became subsequently Bishop of Bristol, and soon after gave Mr. Hesse the small living of Rowbarrow, and his family then removed to Burrington, the adjoining parish to Rowbarrow, and Mr. Hesse resided with his family at Burrington, the parsonage house at Rowbarrow being dilapidated and unfit for habitation, and the bishop tells Mr. Hesse, the father, that it is worth from 120l. to 130l. a year. The fact that the bishop brought the defendant, his curate, from Wearmouth, and gave him this small preferment in Somersetshire, is no slight testimony in [701] his favour, and tends rather strongly to shew that Mrs. Lytton, in speaking of "his amiable character," and "his attention to the sacred duties of his profession," was not insincere, for he was entitled to that praise. But what says Kelly? That Mrs. Lytton communicated to him the contents of the letters; and committing to him the delivery, by his own hand, of this apparently friendly and generous letter, she desires him to tempt and seduce the father of the presentee, in the moment of overflowing gratitude to the benefactress of his son, into an odious, corrupt, illegal engagement, by which she was, in lieu of tithes of the value of 210l., to pay only a modus of 26l. a year; that is, to carve out for herself from this living nearly 200l. a year, to which she knew by the authority of a decree of the Court of Chancery she could establish no legal right.

It was said, as Mrs. Lytton's apology, that she might be ignorant of the law. She might, indeed, not be aware that the presentation would be void, that it would devolve upon the Crown, that she would be liable to a penalty of two years' full value, that this young man, whose "amiable character," whose "attention to the sacred duties of his profession" she so properly describes, would involve himself not only in simony but in perjury; all this might by possibility be so; but she was at least aware of the invalidity of this modus, for that had been recently ascertained by the decision of a court of justice. If she did not write this letter in sincerity and truth, according to the professions it contains; if this proposal (which Kelly swears he made) was made (if made at all) by the desire of Mrs. Lytton, and was not a volunteer act on his part, without the knowledge and privity of [702] Mrs. Lytton, it is difficult to find expressions which are fit for the Court to use, and which would at the same time sufficiently characterize the base contrivance (for it must have been deliberately contrived) to send such a letter in order to entrap a father into such a promise. It cannot be doing Kelly any injustice to suppose that the proposal was rather suggested by him to Mrs. Lytton upon seeing these letters; that he offered to ask Obadiah Hesse if he would consent to granting the lease of the tithes; and that Mrs. Lytton might have inadvertently assented to it, than that she, ignorant of business, should have deliberately been a joint contriver of the plot. It is no injustice, I say, to Mr. Kelly to suppose this, for he admits himself to have been the corrupt agent in endeavouring to procure this odious and simoniacal agreement, by which the incumbent was to be fraudulently robbed of two fifths of the value of the living, under a pretended modus, which Kelly knew she had failed to establish a year and a half before, in consequence of which failure the late incumbent had, from that time till his death, received the full value of the tithes. He might, in order to make some amends for the expenses to which she had been put by the suit in Chancery, have suggested that this proposal should be made to the father of Mr. Hesse, as he has proposed and recommended the present suit, thus publicly disclosing the odious intentions at least of his mistress, and his own readiness to be her agent and witness in the odious transaction. Surely, then, it is necessary for the Court to look at his evidence with great suspicion—he is far from being a witness omni exceptione major: yet, if he is to be credited, a simoniacal bargain was made, after a full ex-[703]-planation of all the circumstances; for his account goes the full length of all the material articles, the charges of which he admits were furnished by him. It is unnecessary, therefore, for the Court to state his evidence; it would only be to repeat what has been read from the articles.

It has been admitted that if the case rested on this witness alone, the Court could not venture to pronounce that the charge was proved: for if a single witness, and such a witness, setting up a mere conversation with a third party, without any documentary proofs leading to a presumption of the concurrence of the party, were sufficient to avoid a presentation, who would be safe in the possession of a living? But it is said that the evidence offered in contradiction is so falsified that it confirms his testimony in the same way that a criminal who fails in an attempt to prove an alibi convicts himself, by procuring, from the falsehood of the defence which he sets up, credit for testimony which was before doubtful. It is necessary, therefore, for the Court to consider who are the witnesses whose evidence is opposed to Kelly's representations. They are the father and the brother of the presentee. It is not, therefore, a case of witness against witness, but of two witnesses against one witness. It is rather singular that neither in the articles, nor in the deposition of Kelly, is any mention made of the presence of George Hesse at the interview; though in answer to an interrogatory it is not denied by Kelly. The father is charged in the articles to have been the agent of, and to have made this corrupt agreement with the privity and by the authority of, the defendant. The defendant has fearlessly produced his father, so that every opportunity has [704] been afforded to cross-examine him, which opportunity has not been sparingly exercised.

Against the general character of Obadiah Hesse nothing is alleged, except that he is the father of the defendant. It appears, too, that he is an affectionate and a liberal father. The account of himself—extorted by interrogatories, going into a degree of inquiry not very usual, and, of course, furnished by Kelly, the instructor of the case—contains nothing in his history to his disadvantage. He is a barrister of very long standing, and describes himself "Captain of the Hall of the Inner Temple, when he dines there." He was called to the bar in 1797, went for some years the Western Circuit; in 1811 quitted the bar, obtained the secretaryship of and another situation under Government connected with the Lotteries, held these appointments many years, is entitled to a pension of 400l. a year: and, in addition, is possessed of considerable private property. He is a person therefore, from his grade in society, his profession and property, primâ facie entitled to credit. There is nothing in his history which reflects upon his moral character, or shews to his disadvantage. He has brought up a family, consisting of three sons and a daughter, in respectable stations. One of the sons, a witness in the cause, is at the bar, a conveyancer; another, James, is the defendant; and Frederick, who is also a witness, and the sister reside at Burrington with their parents. James, as I before said, when he had the curacy of Bishop Wearmouth, resided with his family; and when he came to the living of Rowbarrow his father removed to the adjoining parish of Burrington, and again afforded his son the benefit of residing with his own family. The father has rebuilt the par-[705]-sonage house of Rowbarrow at his own expense, and now resides in it; and, in order still to be near his son, he states that he is in treaty for the purchase of considerable property in Hertfordshire. All these circumstances are extorted by interrogatories; but I discover nothing to the disadvantage of Mr. Hesse: he has shewn great kindness as a father to different parts of his family, and great liberality in building a house on the precarious tenure of the Rowbarrow living, of which that living will have the benefit. As to George Hesse, except that he is the brother of the defendant, there is nothing to object to him. His refusal to answer the 35th interrogatory is not to his discredit: it is offensive to him, and he declines to answer it, apparently rather to assert his right of refusal, than for the sake of any concealment, because he immediately afterwards states facts which sufficiently negative the suggestion. He is a barrister and a conveyancer, and must have been in practice some time, for he is thirty-one years of age: at this time he had just returned to town from Burrington, and then it is that the letters are delivered at his chambers to Obadiah Hesse, and the interview takes place.

Respecting these witnesses, the father and brother, they may have a considerable bias; but though strong kindness and mutual attachment seem to prevail among the members of this family, yet these circumstances are not sufficient to induce the Court to suppose that, for the sake of their relative, they would come forward to depose, on their solemn oaths, any thing contrary to what is the real fact. Attacks have been made on the character of Obadiah Hesse, out of his deposition, chiefly upon the ground of the improbability of [706] some of the circumstances. But it seems hardly possible, on the mere improbability of a statement, to discredit the evidence of a witness of good general character, deposing firmly and solemnly: there must be something amounting to incredibility, something incapable of explanation—not merely that it was improbable that under such circumstances persons in general would have so acted; that is matter of opinion. Different persons act differently in similar circumstances. In the first place, it is said that it is extremely improbable that he should not have asked his son the value of the living of Rowbarrow. The bishop however told him it was 110l. or 120l. a year, and therefore there was no urgent inducement on his part to inquire minutely into the income of his son, to see if he got a few pounds less or more than the bishop told him. Another improbability is that there was no letter of thanks to Mrs. Lytton for the living. But the father sent his thanks to Mrs. Lytton by Kelly, and he called upon her on the 14th; and the son, coming up to town in a few days, waited an opportunity of returning his thanks personally.

Again, it is said how improbable it is that Obadiah Hesse should not have read the paper respecting the tithes beyond a hasty glance at it, and that he should have sent no copy of it to his son. But a hasty glance was sufficient. It is headed, "A General Statement of the Tithes paid to the Late Incumbent of Knebworth Parish." There are the different items alleged to be covered by the modus, and at the bottom of the paper is the value of the living stated at 345l., and it is drawn up in a manner that he who runs may read. There was sufficient to induce Mr. Oba-[707]-diah Hesse to conclude that the value of the living was from 300l. to 400l. a year—sufficient to persuade him that his son would thankfully accept it, and nothing therefore to induce the father to enter into a critical examination, and to scan the value of the living more accurately and more exactly; and if he had done so, there was nothing to shew that the modus was not good: on the contrary, the statement—"all these lands covered by the modus"—would have led him to infer from it that it was a good and valid modus, though Mrs. Lytton might have had great "trouble and vexation" in establishing it. Obadiah Hesse has denied and contradicted Kelly's statement; and it is not merely witness against witness: there are two to one: for if Kelly tells the truth, and nothing but the truth, both Obadiah and George Hesse have deposed falsely. It is not, however, by taking bits and scraps of each deposition that the Court is to form its judgment, but by looking at the whole.

By Kelly's account there was a full detailed explanation of the whole of this corrupt agreement; not indeed specifying exactly the terms used, but mentioning a variety of circumstances which must necessarily have occasioned a full explanation on both sides without reserve.

On an interrogatory addressed to Obadiah Hesse, a further fact is suggested, which is not mentioned in the articles or in the deposition of Kelly. It is the 28th interrogatory: "On your oath did it not on one occasion (October the 12th) appear from a letter then shewn to you by Kelly that an application had been made to Mrs. Lytton for the said living of Knebworth immediately upon the death of the Rev. Mr. Price, and that [708] the writer of such letter had therein declared his willingness to accept the said living subject to the moduses late in dispute between Mrs. Lytton and Mr. Price, and did you not upon reading such letter inquire of Kelly whether the curacy of the producent's living at Rowbarrow would be worth the acceptance of the writer of such letter?" So that besides the different facts stated in the fifth article, and by Kelly in his examination, here is suggested, and I must presume by Kelly, this further fact; the letter is produced and canvassed, and an inquiry made whether the writer would accept the curacy of Rowbarrow. All these facts then took place at the interview of the 12th; and yet it is alleged that it did not last above ten minutes or a quarter of an hour. The Court does not mean to place much reliance upon a computation of time, but it is hardly possible that all these things could have passed in so short a space.

As to the probability of Kelly's story, if probability is to found a test, is it probable that, taking these letters in his hand, communicating the kind, affectionate, grateful intentions of her old friend, Mrs. Lytton, towards Mrs. Hesse and her family, Kelly should at that very moment have fully disclosed the odious and selfish conditions upon which the boon was to be granted; should have said, in short, "You must admit the modus, though you well know it is good for nothing: you well know it has been set aside by the Court of Chancery, but accept the modus notwithstanding, and take 26l. a year in lieu of tithes worth 200l." This is not a very probable course to have been taken under such circumstances, and without reserve. Kelly must have [709] been not only a corrupt, but a very injudicious, agent and negociator: for his propositions, as he states them, of this corrupt and odious demand, completely falsify all the gracious professions of his mistress, Mrs. Lytton, contained in the letters which he had carried in his hand, had delivered, and read. It was unmasking the fraud, and exhibiting the falsehood of the whole case. It is more probable that, with a corrupt object in view, he should only make some general observations which he could pervert and distort into an acquiescence and agreement; that he should say "Here are moduses," should, in order to shew the value of the living, lay on the table the paper which mentions moduses, leaving it to be inferred that they are legal, valid, established moduses, but still at a mere glance shewing the value to be near 350l. But the story told by the two Hesses that the paper was only carelessly thrown down ostensibly to shew the value of the living, and not as the foundation of a corrupt bargain, is much more like the real course of such a transaction, more consistent with probability (as far as probability is concerned), and is in some degree confirmed by the indorsement and heading of the paper, which certainly would lead to an inference that these moduses were valid and established. The Court does not depend much, however, on probabilities or conjectures as to the private tortuous views and objects of Kelly.

But both Obadiah and George Hesse must depose untruly, if all or any considerable part of that which Kelly states took place, for they both say that the interview did not last more than ten minutes or a quarter of an hour: both of them contradict all the explanations, disclosures, and [710] agreements alleged by Kelly to have been made. For example: George Hesse says on the second article, "My father perused Mrs. Lytton's letters, both of them, in my presence, and in Kelly's; he read them twice, at first cursorily, as it appeared, for he read them to himself, and then more particularly; he shortly acquainted me with the contents of the letters, saying that Mrs. Lytton had been so good as to give my brother a living, and how much obliged to her he was. Whilst my father was reading the letters, Kelly stated that he thought we should like to know the value of the living, and that he had ascertained its value as near as he was able; that it was subject to a modus, about which Mrs. Lytton had had a great deal of trouble, and that the living was of course given, subject to the modus. I recollect well that the words Kelly used were 'vexation and trouble' with reference to the modus, subject to which he said Mrs. Lytton gave the living. Whilst my father was engaged reading the letters Kelly also placed on the table a paper, which he said contained the quantity and description of titheable lands in the parish, and the annual value of the entire tithes thereof: that was the effect of the statement he made with respect to the paper which he laid before my father." And in a subsequent part he says: "I can safely say, for I gave my whole attention to what passed at the time—it was a matter in which my brother was so much interested—that no stipulation was made or even suggested either by my father or Kelly, nor any undertaking or agreement entered upon or engaged for in respect to leasing or exchanging with Mrs. Lytton any piece of land of any sort. No allusion was made to any thing of the kind: no-[711]-thing passed upon the occasion directly or indirectly touching upon such a matter or subject. I was not then acquainted with the fact, nor was my father, to my knowledge or belief, that Mrs. Lytton had failed to establish her modus. I knew, or rather I had an impression from having heard the matter talked of, that there had been a question as to a right of modus between Mrs. Lytton and the former rector of Knebworth. Mrs. Lytton had never consulted my father in respect to any dispute or litigation between her and Mr. Price that I know of, or have reason to believe; nor do I know or believe that my father had any knowledge that an order or decree had been made touching the right of modus in question, until the articles in this cause were filed." Obadiah Hesse deposes to the same effect.

Then, according to this evidence, all that passed is, Kelly delivered Mrs. Lytton's letters; while Obadiah Hesse was reading them Kelly laid down paper (A) as an account of the value of the living; said that there were moduses on the living, subject to which Mrs. Lytton made the presentation, and that Mrs. Lytton had had great trouble and vexation about them. George Hesse made a natural and civil answer, that he was sure it was not the wish of his brother to give Mrs. Lytton any trouble or vexation, merely repeating Kelly's words; but as to all these explanations, promises, and agreements, not a word took place. The inference to be drawn by George Hesse from this conversation was that, though the moduses had caused Mrs. Lytton vexation, they were valid and finally established; for paper A, by deducting them, described them as valid. Obadiah Hesse gives as positive a contradiction to Kelly's state-[712]-ment. He says that he did not attend to the whole of the conversation between Kelly and his son, and never heard the word modus mentioned. "Whilst I was still full of Mrs. Lytton's letters, Kelly had turned to my son, and, in answer to something which I did not hear, my son said that 'he was sure his brother would not give Mrs. Lytton any trouble.' I heard my son George say something to that effect to Kelly, but what called for it I certainly did not hear." And in a subsequent part of his evidence he says, "I did not hear Kelly, during the short time he was with me on the aforesaid 12th of October, say a word about moduses or allude to anything of the kind, and I can safely say that I then knew nothing whatever about them." One of the chief improbabilities pointed out in the evidence of Obadiah Hesse is that he should not have heard what Kelly said, nor any thing about the moduses; and it was argued that, as he was present when it is admitted that moduses were talked of, he must have heard it. When this argument was urged, I confess that I did not concur with the observation. Mr. Hesse had just received this unexpected but welcome intelligence of the preferment to be given to his son; he was reading Mrs. Lytton's letters, and naturally enough he read them twice over. Under these circumstances I thought it not improbable that he might not have heard the expression; it appeared to me by no means a departure from the ordinary course of the human mind; and since the argument I have accidentally been confirmed in that opinion by a passage in a recent publication of some celebrity, viz. "Dr. Abercrombie's Enquiries concerning the Intellectual Powers," in which there is this passage: [713] "It is familiar to every one that when the mind is closely occupied, numerous objects may pass before our eyes, and circumstances be talked of in our hearing, of which we do not retain the slightest recollection; and this is often in such a degree as implies not a want of memory only, but an actual want of the perception of the objects" (2d ed. p. 59).

Thus it is not improbable that O. Hesse was so full of the subject of the letters that he did not hear, or paid no attention to, the conversation between Kelly and his son; that he might have only caught the single observation of his son, and might not have heard the word modus mentioned. I am of opinion, therefore, that these accounts are not so improbable as to falsify the testimony of both or either of the witnesses; that, on the contrary, what is deposed to have taken place is so natural under all the circumstances, that the depositions of the two witnesses amount to a full contradiction of Kelly; and that these two witnesses are each at least full as worthy of credit as Kelly. Without entering, therefore, into a further examination of this part of the case, the circumstances in evidence as to what took place on the 12th of October are not sufficient to establish what constitutes the basis of the charge, that there was a corrupt agreement for a simoniacal promotion of the defendant.

It becomes therefore unnecessary to examine, with any degree of minuteness, the interview of the 16th of October, to which Lake is the only witness on the one side, and O. Hesse on the other. It is not maintained that any corrupt agreement per se is proved to have taken place on the 16th: it is only contended that what then occurred when connected with the interview on [714] the 12th amounts to such proof: but if Kelly has proved nothing on the 12th, there is nothing to corroborate or to connect with, and Lake's evidence thus loses all its weight. He is Mrs. Lytton's solicitor, and there is no ground to question his general character and respectability. He, however, is not the solicitor conducting this cause, but is only a witness, Kelly, as I have said, furnishing the facts. It is not therefore extraordinary, nor any discredit to Lake, that his evidence does not support the ninth article as laid. In speaking of the interview with Obadiah Hesse, Lake expressly says: "I told him that Mrs. Lytton wished to have a lease of the whole of the tithes granted to her; and to this he answered 'that he was sure that his son would do any thing Mrs. Lytton wished.' The particular terms of the lease were not alluded to by either, nor was there any agreement concluded between us. I introduced the subject by mentioning how Mrs. Lytton had been circumstanced for a considerable time, owing to the dispute about the tithes; and he expressed himself as being fully aware of the circumstances, and so satisfied on my telling him that Mrs. Lytton's wish was to have a lease of the whole of the tithes granted to her, that he said his son would do every thing she required, and he distinctly undertook to me that his son would do so, and I, satisfied with his assurances, wrote to Mrs. Lytton to that effect: but nothing was said either by Mr. Hesse or myself that it was in consideration of his son's doing what he then undertook for him that he should do that he was to be presented to the aforesaid rectory of Knebworth; nor did he tell me that his son was privy to what he was then promising for him, or that he had his son's authority for what he did so promise—[715] he merely expressed his perfect confidence that his son would perform what he undertook for him, and do every thing to Mrs. Lytton's satisfaction."

What, then, is the fair construction of this?

Here is a mere general answer by Obadiah Hesse that his son would do what Mrs. Lytton wished—no particulars entered into, no agreement made, no privity nor authority on the part of the son suggested; and Lake expressly declares that this lease was not the condition of the presentation. On Lake's own statement no corrupt agreement or promise is proved on the 16th.

The granting a lease of the tithes is not necessarily simoniacal; it might be that the full value was to be allowed for the tithes. The answer, "He was sure his son would do any thing Mrs. Lytton wished," must be understood as any thing which Mrs. Lytton could with propriety ask, and his son could with propriety grant; not that he would do any thing corrupt or simoniacal as a consideration for obtaining the living. Obadiah Hesse gives a clearer account of the conversation than Lake—he says "that Lake spoke of the modus as valid; that the lease was suggested by Richardson, a former agent of Mrs. Lytton, but that he, Lake, doubted the expediency of it, as it might produce suits: and Obadiah Hesse pointed out the invidious circumstances in which his son might be placed thereby; and distinctly told Lake that he could undertake nothing whatever for his son." It is so pleaded in the responsive allegation, and it has not been counterpleaded, though it might have been. Obadiah Hesse so deposes, and it has not been attempted by an exceptive allegation to disprove the truth of this [716] part of the deposition, not even as to his fetching a volume of Burn to shew he could make no promise for his son.

From both accounts it appears that Mrs. Lytton was desirous of a lease of the tithes; and the most imprudent step, and the most unsatisfactory part of the case, is that Obadiah Hesse did so far give way to that wish as, on the 27th of October, to consent that a skeleton lease should be drawn and sent to him for perusal. In his answer to the seventeenth interrogatory he admits that; but he positively deposes that it was only to satisfy Mrs. Lytton, but without any intention of granting it. The skeleton lease is exhibited. In it no mention is made of moduses, nor is the amount of rent fixed; and without the rent it does not appear whether the modus of 26l. a year was even contemplated in lieu of tithes of 210l., or was or was not proposed to be accepted. All this takes place after induction; and Lake, as I have said, admits it was not on the 16th made the condition of the presentation; nor were any particulars then entered upon. On the 27th this preparation of the lease was set in motion: the defendant was not privy to it, and when it was communicated to him he declined to execute it; he "cannot and will not have any thing to do with it:" and it was never executed.

There is a subsequent circumstance, which is not very material to the main issue, except as going to credit. After alleging various circumstances as occurring on the 25th and 27th October, the articles go on to plead in the eighteenth article: "In pursuance of the simoniacal covenants and agreements made by or for you, and with your privity and consent, as a consideration [717] for your obtaining the presentation to the rectory, Kelly, with your privity and consent, and in anticipation of the lease or leases undertaken to be executed by you in favour of the aforesaid Mrs. Lytton, did, on 28th October, 1830, take possession of the cow pasture meadow, part of the glebe aforesaid, for her, in her name and on her behalf, and also did, with your privity and consent, for her, and in her name and on her behalf, underlet the same cow pasture meadow to one Richard Ilott." And Kelly, in support of this article, deposes thus: "I took possession of the cow pasture meadow on the 28th or 29th of October last, in the name and on the behalf of Mrs. Lytton, and in pursuance of the agreement of which I have before spoken; but more particularly in consequence of the authority which Obadiah Hesse had given me in the name of his son James to take possession thereof for Mrs. Lytton, at an interview I had with him a day or two before. At the time I took possession of the said meadow I took the articulate Richard Ilott with me, and told him he might hold it as he had been in the habit of doing before. I do not recollect that I mentioned Mrs. Lytton's name to him; or said on what terms he was to hold the meadow, except that he might have it as he had held it under Mr. Price, and the time has not come when Mrs. Lytton receives her rent."

That is the way Kelly deposes to this article. He does not come quite up to the article, or say that he did underlet the meadow in the name of Mrs. Lytton, because he cannot recollect whether he mentioned to Ilott the name of Mrs. Lytton or not. Ilott has, however, been examined as a witness on the article, and does not support it: [718] for he says "that the meadow was let to him merely in the ordinary way, that Mrs. Lytton's name was not mentioned in the matter." Kelly says that he had not received the rent, because the time had not arrived when Mrs. Lytton receives her rent; but it appears from Ilott's evidence that he had paid the rent to Mr. Hesse, and not to Kelly, the agent of Mrs. Lytton; and that accounts for Kelly's not speaking quite up to the article.

The defendant pleads in the seventh article of his allegation: "That on Monday, the 25th October, 1830, James Hesse, together with Obadiah Hesse, George Hesse, and Kelly, being then at the house of Mrs. Lytton, at Knebworth, it was proposed that they should look at the rectory house and the glebe. That whilst they were engaged in the inspection of the glebe Kelly informed James Hesse that Ilott (then tenant and occupier of the glebe) was willing and anxious to continue to hold so much of the same as was arable. Whereupon James Hesse replied 'that he was ready to consent to such an arrangement for the following year.' That James Hesse expressed his intention of holding the said pasture land, including the cow pasture, himself, and requested Kelly, as his agent, to make the most of it till the pastures were shut up for hay. That on the said occasion no other conversation passed between the parties with reference to or connected with the cow pasture field, or the letting thereof." According to this statement, the meadow was not taken possession of for, nor let as belonging to, Mrs. Lytton; but James Hesse desires Kelly to make the most of it. And the tenth article pleads in confirmation of this "that Hesse caused the cow [719] pasture meadow to be shut up for hay, that he mended the gaps in the hedges, and received the rent."

George and Obadiah Hesse depose in confirmation of this article. The question, which is the true account, may throw much light on the relative credit of the Hesses and of Kelly. How does the transaction turn out? What is the conduct of both parties? Ilott had the pasturing as he had before for many years under the former rector; he says "he took it of Kelly, but that the name of Mrs. Lytton was never mentioned to him on the occasion." He pays his rent to James Hesse: at the proper season Hesse fences up the field for hay: he has the mole hills levelled—has it mowed for hay; he is rated to the parish for it, he pays the rates as well as receives the rent from Ilott. Kelly then thinks proper to set up a claim on the faith of a simoniacal contract or agreement. When was this done first? After the articles were given in. Before that time there was no suggestion that Kelly was in possession of the cow pasture on behalf of Mrs. Lytton. It is not pleaded that a single step was taken to interrupt the possession of Mr. Hesse till after the articles were given in. Then this is set up for the first time. The articles were given in on the 13th of May: on the 1st of June Kelly turns in the cows of Mrs. Lytton, as an assertion of possession on her part. The cows are turned out by Hesse's servant. Kelly then, armed with his constable's staff and attended by the deputy steward and two or three other persons, turns the cows in again, and tells James Hesse's servant to turn them out at his peril. What does James Hesse do? He does not tamely submit—he boldly brings an [720] action against Kelly for a trespass, when of course this agreement must be the main defence against the action. Kelly is examined on the 8th of June, and he gives that part of his evidence which I have read. The action is tried; and it comes out in the evidence of George Hesse, incidentally, on interrogatory, that his brother succeeded in his action; and consequently that this agreement for the cow pasture was not substantiated, and was not really entered into. It is perfectly demonstrated that the field was not let for Mrs. Lytton, and that the rent was received by Hesse, and I must consider that Kelly, when he supplied the information on which this eighteenth article was drawn, must have known that he was causing matters to be inserted which were untrue and which the evidence of his own witness has completely falsified.

This circumstance, as I have said, only affects this criminal suit for simony, as shewing that false facts have been set up in these articles, and as bearing on the credit of Kelly. It is, however, hardly necessary for that purpose: for, on the whole, considering the burden of proof is on the promoters, and that a forfeiture of the freehold would be the result if this part of the case were proved, the Court is of opinion that the weight of the evidence is against the charge, and that the proof will not warrant a sentence that the defendant was simoniacally promoted. Even if there were a doubt upon the question, the defendant would be entitled to the benefit of the doubt, and to an acquittal. But supposing the proof on the second point had established that the defendant had been simoniacally promoted, the Court having decided that he is not guilty of simony, and that he was [721] not privy to the simoniacal promotion, or guilty of any ex post facto act confirming and carrying into effect any corrupt agreement, could a sentence of deprivation be pronounced by this Court in a criminal suit; for it is a criminal suit; the defendant is charged with a crime—with an odious and corrupt bargain; he is innocent of the charge: can he then be punished for a crime of which he is not guilty? The statute may render his title invalid, and it may be loosely said by some writers that the presentee is thereby punished. But the use of such a term will not render him liable to a criminal proceeding by articles "for his soul's health." This is not the sort of suit to be brought for that purpose. The moral character of the defendant, though untouched, has been attacked, for if privy, he must have been guilty of gross perjury; if he is innocent, he is in plain justice entitled to be dismissed from the suit, and to be dismissed with costs.

The suit in this form ought not to have been brought against the defendant. No authority is to be found that establishes such a principle—that in a criminal suit a party can be punished for a crime of which he is not guilty. Clarke (Praxis, tit. 132) and Oughton (Ordo Jud. t. 4) lay it down that for simony a party may be proceeded against and punished either ex officio or ad instantiam partis: but they do not lay it down that if a party be proceeded against criminally and be not guilty of simony, he may be deprived because he has been simoniacally promoted without his privity or sanction. They say nothing of "simoniacè promotus." The phrase is, si clericus commisit simoniam. There is no instance [722] of a proceeding since the stat. of Eliz. against a person as simoniacè promotus. Nor is there any case before the statute, recorded in the annals of these Courts. That statute declared the presentation to be void and to devolve upon the Crown. The proceeding under that statute has been in all instances, for nearly 300 years, by a quare impedit. The authorities do not quite satisfy me that the canon law had ever so far been received into the ecclesiastical law of this country as to render a clerk "simoniacè promotus," but not privy, liable to be deprived; or that such was the law of this country before the stat. of Eliz., by the ninth section of which statute the penalties before inflicted by the ecclesiastical law are preserved. The case of Baker v. Rogers (Cro. Eliz. 788), though relied upon and coming nearest, does not quite establish that point: nay, it rather seems to be an authority on the other side. In that case a prohibition was moved for in a suit before the High Commission Court. It was suggested as the facts of the case that the living being void, the brother of Baker had given 180l. for the presentation, to which Baker was not privy: but after possession of the living the brother informed him what he had paid for the presentation, requiring him to have consideration thereof. The clerk was proceeded against before the High Commission Court, not as simoniacè promotus, but for simony. The Court pronounced that this was simony, and deprived him: for so, says the report, is their course when one is deprived as simoniacus. The prohibition was refused on the ground that the High Commission Court had found him guilty of simony: he was [723] deprived as simoniacus, not as simoniacè promotus; and the Temporal Court could not enter into the facts whether really or not guilty of simony; whether the brother, having told him that he had given this 180l. for the presentation during the avoidance, and requiring him to have consideration thereof, made him ex post facto a party to the simony; whether he had had consideration and repaid his brother, or what other facts there might be to render him simoniacus, and not merely simoniacè promotus, the Court would not inquire, for the High Commission Court, to which prohibition was prayed, had found it simony. If the High Commission Court had pronounced him simoniacè promotus merely, and entertained a criminal suit against the defendant, non constat, that a prohibition might not have been granted, and that it might not have been decided that the High Commission Court had gone beyond its jurisdiction.

In the present case there is no privity before, nor confirmation after: here the incumbent is not informed that any money was given or any promise made, nor has he been required to have consideration thereof. The fact that any contract or obligation was entered into is denied throughout. In the judgment of the Court, then, he is not simoniacus. Even if there had been proof that he was simoniacè promotus without his privity, he has not been guilty of any crime for which this Court, in this criminal suit, can punish him, supposing that his possession were invalid under the statute. It must be remembered that the case of Baker v. Rogers, the only decided case pointed out as countenancing in the remotest degree any such [724] proceeding, occurred in Queen Elizabeth's time, and that there has been no such case since.

The stat. of Wm. (1 W. c. 16) has been referred to in the argument. That statute merely enacts that the forfeiture shall not be taken advantage of after the death of the party guilty of simony or simoniacally promoted, when a subsequent patron has presented and a new clerk been admitted. The statute does not apply to the present case, except that the same principle of justice would apply to deprivation without guilt. It recites, "That whereas after the death of a simoniacal person, another, innocent of such crime, has been troubled to the prejudice of the innocent patron in reversion, and of his clerk, whereby the guilty goeth away with the profit of his crime, and the innocent succeeding patron and his clerk are punished contrary to all reason and good conscience." If it be contrary to all reason and good conscience that an innocent patron should be punished, it is equally so that an innocent clerk simoniacè promotus without his privity should be deprived of his living under the sentence of this Court in the present criminal proceeding. To the same effect Mr. Justice Blackstone says (2 Bl. Com. 280): "If a simoniacal contract be made with the patron, the clerk not being privy thereto, the presentation for that turn shall indeed devolve to the Crown as a punishment of the guilty patron; but the clerk, who is innocent, does not incur any disability or forfeiture." The same is laid down in the 3 Inst. 154, and also in the 12th Rep., in Dr. Hutchinson's case: "If the presentee be not conusant of the corruption, then he shall not [725] be within the clause of disability of the same statute, and so it was resolved by all the judges (vide verba statuti), which are very well penned against the avarice of corrupt patrons." (a) It would be well if this observation of Lord Coke's were conveyed to the patroness of this living, if, indeed, Kelly charges her truly with having desired him to act as he has acted.

Upon the whole then of this third point (though it seems hardly necessary to decide it), the Court is of opinion that if the weight of the evidence had even proved a corrupt agreement between O. Hesse and the agent of Mrs. Lytton, without the knowledge and privity of his son, and unconfirmed by him, it would not be sufficient to authorize the Court in this criminal suit to proceed to a sentence of deprivation. After a full consideration, however, of the evidence in the cause, the Court is of opinion, on the second point, that the fact of a corrupt bargain, by which the defendant was (a) See also Wilson v. Bradshaw, 2 Roll. Rep. 463.

"simoniacally promoted," has not been established. But, above all, I am of opinion, on the first point, that the party has been proceeded against criminally for an offence of which he is not guilty; and, considering all the circumstances of the case—who the parties are that have really instituted the suit, and the manner in which it has been carried on—I am also of opinion that the defendant is not only entitled to be dismissed, but to be dismissed with his full costs.

[726] BLAKE v. USBORNE. Court of Peculiars, Hilary Term, 1st Session, 1832.—A person who has permission from the churchwardens to sit in a pew temporarily, and in order, by keeping possession for the future tenant, to carry into effect the conditions of sale of a house with which the pew had for above a century been held under an expired faculty, has no possession on which he can bring a suit for perturbation against a mere intruder, such permission by the churchwardens being illegal, as confirming the sale of the pew. On the plaintiff declaring he proceeded no further, the Court dismissed the defendant with a sum nomine expensarum, refusing to give full costs on the ground that there had been irregularities on both sides.—By the general law, the use of all pews belongs to the parishioners, who are to be in the first instance seated by the churchwardens, subject to the control of the ordinary.—On the expiration of a faculty limited to a certain period, the right of the parishioners to the pews the subject of such faculty revives.

This was a cause of perturbation of church seat between two parishioners and inhabitants of Croydon. The libel pleaded that the pew was erected under a faculty in 1725, and was transferred to Haines in 1816, under an assignment of the remainder of a term of ninety-nine years, which expired in 1826; that Haines continued to sit in it till his death in 1830: that in March, 1831, the house was let to Harman, and the churchwardens agreed that the pew should go with the house which was then under repair; but that while under repair Blake and his mother and family should occupy it; that on the 17th of April Usborne (without any authority), in opposition to this arrangement, intruded; and on the 23d of April the churchwardens gave Blake a written authority, No. 1, and on the same day Blake informed Usborne by letter, No. 2,(a)[1] of the arrangement. On the 24th Usborne again intruded; and on the 30th Blake wrote No. 3; (b) and [727] on the 1st of May Usborne wrote No. 4,(a)[2] and on the same day again intruded. On the 7th of May the churchwardens gave Blake a written authority to lock the door against Usborne; on the 8th Usborne endeavoured to enter, and finding the door locked used some angry expressions, and on the 15th, previous to the commencement of divine service, climbed into the pew: and on the 18th the churchwardens assigned part of another pew to Usborne; that on the 24th of July Usborne again intruded in the morning, and in the evening forced open the

---

(a)[1] Extracts from No. 2. "The churchwardens have, while Mr. Haines' late house remains untenanted, given me an authority to use the pew allotted to that house, and the key, with the sanction of all interested parties, has been delivered to me. . . . I was not aware, till I saw the churchwardens to-day, that you had sat in the pew last Sunday, and had expressed an intention of taking possession of it for the use of your family; and both they and myself deemed it proper, in order to avoid inconvenience, that you should be apprised of the present arrangement."

(b) No. 3. "Recurring to the circumstances of the late Mr. Haines' pew, I repeat that the churchwardens have, in conjunction with Mr. Price and Mr. Harman, placed the care of the same in my hands under certain qualifications; I therefore think it right to say that the accommodation I require during the period of my occupation will be the seats on the side next to Mr. Minier's pew, the others, as far as I am concerned, are much at your service, upon the understanding that you enter the pew upon sufferance, undertaking to vacate the same whenever it may be demanded by Mr. Harman on behalf of his tenant. For the sake of clearness, I request the favour of your addressing a letter upon the subject, expressive of the conditions referred to, either to the churchwardens or myself before church-time to-morrow."

(a)[2] No. 4. "In answer to yours received late last evening, I beg to say, on no account will I compromise the rights and privileges of the churchwardens by any act of mine: and I am sure you will see this resolve correct, for in all probability next year you will be one."

lock: the libel prayed that Usborne might be admonished from disturbing Blake, and condemned in costs.

The allegation in reply pleaded generally—that Usborne had been long an inhabitant, and, though he had frequently applied, had been unable to obtain a pew, so many being supposed to be appropriated by faculty: that the faculty as to the pew in question had expired; that in March, 1831, the house was sold by auction; and that [728] Blake was the auctioneer. That in April, Usborne applied to one of the churchwardens for sittings in the pew in question, who told him that Harman, who had already a pew, was to have the choice of the two; and that Usborne should be seated in the other; that Harman declining to occupy, Usborne sat therein; that the permission subsequently given to Blake and his family was obtained on false representations that the pew was a faculty pew appurtenant to Harman's house. The remainder of the allegation went at great length into several communications from April 17 to May 29, between the churchwardens and Usborne, respecting the pew, in which, as pleaded, the churchwardens had not informed Usborne that they had given Blake a written authority to sit in the pew, nor to lock the door; and that Usborne was first informed thereof by a letter from Blake's solicitor on the 7th of June,(a)[1] and it denied or explained the several disturbances laid in the libel; and alleged that the pew assigned to [729] Usborne was insufficient in size. The allegation exhibited the conditions of sale, and a subsequent correspondence between Blake and Usborne respecting the pew.(a)[2]

Lushington and Nicholl in objection to the allegation. No claim by faculty or prescription is asserted: both parties rest on a mere possessory title, the [730] faculty has expired, and is merely pleaded historically.

(a)[1] Extract of a letter from Mr. Drummond to Mr. Usborne.

"Croydon, 7 June, 1831.

"Dear Sir,—Mr. Harman and Mr. Price have called upon me with Mr. Blake on the subject of a claim which you appear to have been making to the possession of a pew in the south gallery of Croydon church, and they have desired me to commence a suit against you in the Court of Peculiars. . . . This is a faculty pew purchased by the late Mr. Haines in 1816 of Mr. B. Long for 60 g^s^.; Miss Haines (Mr. Haines' representative) has granted a lease of the house, lately occupied by Mr. Haines, and of this pew, to Mr. Harman for 21 years. In addition to this, the churchwardens have by writing under their hands authorized Mr. Blake to occupy the pew until Mr. Harman has found a tenant for the house, and as you were unwilling to accept Mr. Blake's offer of occupying part of the pew upon the same terms that he would occupy the remainder, the churchwardens authorized Mr. Blake to lock the door against you."

(a)[2] Mr. Blake to Mr. Usborne—

"May 8.

"Dear Sir,—As my conduct while representing the interest of other parties may be misconstrued, I beg to say, in the case of the late Mr. Haines' pew, that there is nothing whatever of personality towards you: it is thought right the privileges of others should be protected, and of course my conduct as their representative results from the advice I have received."

"Sir,—In answer to yours, just received, there is nothing can justify your conduct at the church this morning in preventing my son entering the pew, and I regret you think proper to be made the tool of other parties. I have the assurance of the churchwardens to-day that they have given neither you or any other person permission to lock the pew against us, and are much surprised at your taking that liberty. Should I experience similar treatment next Sunday, I shall certainly apply to the proper authorities for redress. I hear this is not the only instance of your acting to prohibit parishioners in their right to a pew.—Your most obedient servant,

"Thos. Usborne."

"May 11.

"Sir,—I received yours of Sunday last by the 3d post; and will spare you all trouble upon the subject of the late Mr. Haines' pew, by assuring you that I shall keep the door locked. I chuse to be thus unequivocal that you may not remain in doubt as to my future conduct in the transaction.—Your obedient servant,

"John Blake."

"If a house has always had a pew, it may be a fair ground for the churchwardens to place the proprietor there." Turner v. Giraud, 3 Phil. 587. So in Fuller v. Lane, 2 Add. 438, the Court intimated a similar opinion. But in a suit of this sort, neither by nor against churchwardens, the Court cannot consider whether the party was properly seated, but whether, being legally seated by the churchwardens, he has been disturbed. For "whether the churchwardens have exercised a sound discretion in the selection of the actual occupant is no part of the question to be decided, even in a suit against churchwardens for disturbing one person in order to seat another." Wyllie v. Mott, 1 Hagg. Ecc. 40.

Per Curiam. The question of law is, Was Blake in such a possession of this pew as to be liable to be disturbed? Was he seated there as an inhabitant, or only to carry into effect the conditions of sale?

Argument resumed.

Whenever churchwardens have exercised their authority, no one can of his own authority dispossess them: the only mode of opposing the arrangement is an appeal to the ordinary, who, if the churchwardens are in error, will correct them: even the churchwardens having exercised their authority are functi officio. Lord Stowell, in Groves v. Wright, 1 Hagg. Con. 195, said, "A prescriptive title cannot be altered by any authority, nor a possessory title by the churchwarden alone, though it may be by the ordinary." This [731] is a little qualified in Parham v. Templar, 3 Phil. 523: "The churchwardens may remove persons originally placed in seats, or their descendants; but if they do so capriciously, or without just ground, the ordinary will control and correct them." Blake, therefore, though his sitting was temporary, had a primâ facie possessory title, and may bring a suit, for which a fact of possession is sufficient. Petman v. Bridger, 1 Phil. 324. The objection that Blake has no sufficient original title on which to found a suit of perturbation should have been taken to the libel which states all the facts. This allegation in effect amounts to an affirmative issue, because it admits no title in Usborne.

Addams contrà. I admit, generally speaking, that possessory titles are sufficient for such a suit. But what is Blake's possession? It is nothing more than occupancy till Harman can find a tenant for the house: Blake is not the real party; the suit is not by Blake for disturbing him, but is in fact for the enhancement of the value of Harman's house. Blake's letters shew that he was acting as the agent of others: the matter has been brought vexatiously into Court; my party is entitled to his costs.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. This is a suit for perturbation of seat brought by Mr. Blake, a parishioner of Croydon, against Mr. Usborne, also a parishioner. A long libel, consisting of eleven articles with several exhibits annexed, has been given in, and a long allegation, consisting of nineteen articles with further exhibits, is now tendered in contradiction and reply. [732] Upon these pleas many witnesses will probably be examined and considerable expence be incurred, yet the merits may be collected from the letters exhibited, which are sufficient to shew that the question is one rather of law than of fact. When such is the case, the Court is always anxious to give an early intimation of its opinion upon the law, more especially in parochial matters, in order that the parish should get into the right course, and that animosities should cease as soon as possible; since it seldom happens that the interest and excitement of such a contest are confined to the immediate litigants. The Court, therefore, will not restrict the expression of its opinion merely to the admissibility of the present allegation, but will extend it to the whole case as far as it is at present developed.

The facts appear to be these: In the early part of the last century, in the year 1725, a new gallery was erected in the parish church of Croydon, under a faculty then granted; the population of the place was at that time increasing, and has up to the present hour continued to increase very rapidly. It should seem that to encourage contributions towards the erection of this gallery the faculty allowed the contributors not only to have pews in the gallery allotted to them for a term of ninety-nine years, but to assign those pews to any other parishioners: whether this power of assignment was general or limited to one term is not now very material, as the whole term expired some years since; nor is it material to inquire whether during the term the general right of the parishioners and of the ordinary was suspended and excluded: at all events it revived at the expiration of the ninety-nine years.

[733] By the general law the use of all pews belongs to the parishioners: they are to be seated therein in the first instance by the churchwardens: the power of the latter, however, is subject to the control of the ordinary, who is to see that the churchwardens exercise their authority discreetly for the proper accommodation of the parishioners at large. This is the law not merely as held in this Court, not merely to be found in ecclesiastical authorities, but is the common law of the land as laid down by the highest common law authorities. It will be sufficient to refer to Lord Coke, 12 Rep. 105, and 3 Inst. 202.

In the present case, then, the faculty having by the lapse of the ninety-nine years expired some years since, the right of the parishioners to the use of the pews in the gallery revived. Such is my view of the clear law of the case thus far.

One of these pews, the pew in question, was, on the expiration of the faculty, occupied by a Mr. Haines, who had been in possession since 1816: he dwelt in a respectable house and premises, and with that house the possession of this pew seems generally to have been allowed to pass. But of course no prescriptive right had been acquired, for the origin of the title appears as well as the condition and terms on which the pew was granted. Though, however, this faculty right expired before Mr. Haines' death, and though he had no prescriptive right, yet as long as he lived and continued an inhabitant of the parish in this or some other respectable house he had personally such a possessory right as, except on very strong grounds of paramount necessity arising from an urgent want of accommodation for other persons, it might be improper to disturb.

[734] But upon his death, the pew having reverted to the use of the parishioners, it became the duty of the churchwardens to allot the pew to the use of the parishioners by accommodating as many families as it was capable of receiving. It was a large pew situated in the gallery where the higher classes of the inhabitants are placed. If there was not any one large family of long standing and respectable station in the parish who wanted such a pew, the churchwardens might place in it two or three families, giving them sittings in proportion to their numbers; for in a dense and increasing population a pew may be allotted in portions and sittings, if the exigency of the parish renders such an exercise of discretion expedient and proper.

Now, what were the facts? After the death of Mr. Haines his house was sold by auction and purchased by Mr. Harman. Mr. Blake, who was the auctioneer, held out that this pew increased the value of the premises, and promised to deliver possession of it, which he had no legal right to promise or engage to do:—because if he had no legal title to the pew, he had no power to give possession. Now, appended to the advertisement of sale is the following notice:—"There is a pew in the south gallery of Croydon church which was occupied many years by the late Mr. Haines. Possession of the pew will be given to the purchaser of the estate; but the vendor will not be bound to make out any title to it." Therefore Mr. Blake, as I have just stated, engaged to do more than he legally could do. The pew was vacant. Mr. Harman occupied another pew, and did not attempt to remove into this pew. Mr. Usborne, with or without the authority of the [735] churchwardens, for that is a point in dispute, sat in it as a vacant pew. Mr. Blake, finding what Mr. Usborne had done, and in order to keep possession for the purchaser and future occupier of the house, obtained the churchwardens' permission that he and his mother should temporarily sit in the pew; but there was no regular seating of him and his mother in this large pew as the future permanent occupants of it. If there had been, the churchwardens would have exercised their discretion improperly; but what they did was evidently done with the view before stated, of enabling Blake to fulfil the conditions of sale, by keeping possession till the pew was wanted for the occupant of Mr. Haines' house. This was perfectly irregular and improper, and gave no legal right to exclude others: Blake had no possession in which he was capable of being in legal consideration disturbed, and consequently he was not warranted in bringing a suit of perturbation against any person who might enter the seat.

The question is not whether Mr. Usborne has acquired any legal possession, but whether Mr. Blake has been illegally disturbed. The suit is founded on an asserted possessory right, but where was the legal possession? It has been argued that if a person is seated by the churchwardens, that is legal possession; but what they did was not legal; for Mr. Blake prevailed on them in fact to confirm a sale of this pew. Mr. Blake then had no legal possessory title; nor is the suit brought by the churchwardens complaining that their right of seating has been infringed. If the suit had been so brought, the Court could not have supported this exercise of their office, viz. placing Mr. Blake [736] to keep possession for Mr. Harman, or his tenant: they had a right to seat a proper person, but they had no right to seat in order to confirm a sale, and thereby in effect to be parties to the sale. The faculty right having expired, it was the duty of the churchwardens to do the contrary of what they have done: it was their duty for the benefit of the parishioners rather to sever this pew from the late Mr. Haines' house, than to continue it to the succeeding tenant; they would then have discountenanced the impression which appears to be prevalent in the parish, that this pew was appropriated to the house: though if a large and respectable family had succeeded to Haines' house, and there had been no other claimants with equal pretensions, the churchwardens might with some degree of propriety have continued the pew to such family.

If, then, the facts should turn out as I have collected, and is pretty evidently the case from Mr. Blake's own letters, and if the Court has not taken an erroneous view of Mr. Blake's legal right, he possibly may be advised that his best course is to bring this suit to a termination on the best terms that he can, possibly even by payment of costs if required.

It appears that Mr. Usborne is a respectable person, and a parishioner of some standing; he, however, has certainly not acquired any right to the pew, and may be removed; and the Court would be unwilling to give a sanction to his conduct, and thus give currency to an opinion that a parishioner, when a pew is vacant, is justified in stepping into and occupying it without legal authority; but, at all events, he should be properly seated; and if there are not very strong [737] reasons to the contrary, I should certainly recommend that the churchwardens should not continue the pew to the occupier of Mr. Haines' house.

The matter had better stand over till the next session, and if no arrangement can be made in the interim, I must then proceed to examine the allegation more minutely before I admit it to proof.

2d Session.—On the second session Mr. Blake's counsel declared that, under the suggestion of the Court, Mr. Blake would proceed no further: and on costs being prayed on behalf of Usborne, remarked that Blake had a written authority (dated on 23d April) from the churchwardens to sit in the pew; that he had offered Mr. Usborne to sit jointly with him, and had in his conduct throughout been courteous; that there was no necessity to give in the allegation, as the objection to Blake's title appeared on the libel. It was answered that where a party proceeded no further, the other side was of course entitled to be dismissed with his costs.

Per Curiam. The whole proceeding originated in an error of law: the law being clear to the Court, there is no use in continuing the suit. Mr. Usborne seems, to a certain extent, to have acted irregularly; he was not seated by the churchwardens; besides, the real state of the case could have been sufficiently gathered from the libel; there consequently could be no necessity for this long allegation. Though Mr. Usborne's advisers might, for the purpose of defence, think it desirable to plead, the other party ought not to be burdened [738] with the costs of the plea. I shall therefore only give £15 nomine expensarum, which I conceive would have covered the expenses if the case had stopped at the libel.

STORY v. STORY. Arches Court, Hilary Term, 3rd Session, 1832.—In matrimonial suits the libel must contain all facts that can by diligence be ascertained at the time, and subsequently new facts only, which are nearly conclusive of guilt, can be pleaded. The Court, on appeal, affirmed the rejection of additional articles, on the ground that the facts might have been pleaded originally, and were inconclusive.

This suit commenced in the Consistory Court of London by a citation taken out by the husband on the ground of his wife's adultery.

The parties were married by banns in March, 1807, and cohabited until June, 1831. They had six children living. In support of the charge of adultery the following were circumstances pleaded in the libel as reformed after debate:—

That in June, 1830, J. A. Harper (a nephew of Mr. Story's) returned from India and resided with his father at Hackney, but often visited his uncle, and frequently walked alone with Mrs. Story, when improper familiarities passed, and a criminal intercourse was formed and carried on between them. That Mrs. Story, on the 21st of May, 1831, in her way to Brighton, went to Mr. Harper's, the father of Mr. Story's nephew. That about two in the morning of the 22nd Miss Story, a sister of Mr. Story, was awakened by a noise from Mrs. Story's room; that on listening she distinctly heard the voices of Mrs. Story and J. A. Harper, as if conversing in an endearing tone: that Miss Story, having [739] knocked at the door of Mrs. Story's room and ascertained from her that she was not ill, went immediately to the bed-room of J. A. H., and not finding him there, knocked again at Mrs. Story's door and was admitted, the door being unlocked and opened by Mrs. Story in her night dress only, who, in answer to Miss Story, informed her that she did not know where was J. A. Harper; that Miss Story, observing the bed to be in great disorder, lifted up the vallance, and discovered J. A. Harper, in his night cap and shirt only, under the bed; that she thereupon retired to her room, but shortly afterwards, at Mrs. Story's request, returned, when Mrs. Story earnestly intreated her not to divulge what had occurred, and observed, "It was more my fault than his." That while Miss Story was at Mrs. Story's door Charlotte Tallowin, a servant in the family, having been disturbed by the knocking, came down stairs, saw Miss Story at the door and heard her speaking. That on the said occasion adultery was committed.

The libel further pleaded that Miss Story, about two days afterwards, thinking it was her duty not to conceal the transaction of the 22nd of May from Mr. Harper, the father, informed him, but by his desire did not disclose it to Mr. Story. That Mrs. Story having paid a visit in Richmond Terrace stayed for a few days with her husband at an hotel in Surrey Street, after which she on Monday, 13th of June, proceeded to Brighton with her daughters and servant, and there joined her mother. That almost immediately after Mrs. Story had left the hotel a letter (by the two-penny post) addressed to her was delivered to her husband: that he read it, and being much surprised and [740] alarmed at the contents,(a) advised thereon with his sister Mrs. W. Harper, who (aware of the circumstances already pleaded) strongly recommended him not to permit his nephew to visit his family at Brighton, and ultimately informed him, hitherto ignorant and unsuspecting, of his wife's adulterous intercourse: that the intelligence much shocked and distressed him, and he consulted with his half brother, and requested him to acquaint Mrs. Story with his (Mr. S.'s) determination not to live with her again: but it being arranged that this communication should be deferred, it was not made till the arrival of Mrs. Story in London, on her way home.

Annexed to the libel was a pocket book pleaded to be Mrs. Story's, and it was alleged that opposite to the date of 28th April, 1831, "My dearest life, I love you, H.," was written by J. A. Harper with her concurrence.(b)

On the by-day an additional article to the libel was debated: it pleaded that from the 15th to the 25th February, 1831, Mrs. Story and daughters were on a visit at Mr. Harper's, and Mrs. Story and J. A. H. occupied rooms opposite to each other: that, one morning, while making Mrs. Story's bed, Harbour, one of the housemaids, observed on the sheets certain marks or stains pre-[741]-cisely similar to those which had been frequently noticed by her and others in the bed of J. A. H., and which were well known by them to be occasioned by the discharge of the color from the silk drawers in which he had, since his return from India, usually slept. That Harbour, suspecting that J. A. H. had been in Mrs. Story's bed, shewed to Charlotte Tallowin the stains; that the same were not on the sheets when the bed was made on the previous day, and the sheets had not been changed. That on Mrs. Story's night dress, put on clean the preceding night, were corresponding marks. The article pleaded on this occasion adultery.

The rejection of this additional article having been appealed from, the admissibility of it was again debated.

Addams and Matcham against the admission.

Dodson and Haggard contrà.

(a) The letter was as follows:—

"Dearest Mary,—I am most cruelly disappointed not having the pleasure of seeing you, shall wait at home all to-morrow in anxious expectation of a note. Do let me see you.—Yours ever most sincerely.

"Sunday.

"Did you get mine safe?"

(b) The rest of the libel was totally irrelevant to the question before the Court.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. This is an appeal from the Consistory Court of London on a grievance—the rejection of additional articles to a libel. It is a suit brought by the husband for separation by reason of adultery; the citation was returned on the 4th of August, 1831, the libel was brought in on the 20th of October, 1831, was admitted on the second session of Michaelmas Term, the 18th of November; on the by-day, the 10th of December, the additional articles were brought in; on the 14th of December were rejected; and from that rejection the [742] husband has appealed. I must suppose there will be some evidence of familiarities at St. Alban's, and if the libel be proved as laid, there will be full proof of adultery.

I am of opinion that these additional articles were properly rejected. First, a party is not at liberty to make charges by piecemeal; he must bring forward all his case at once, particularly as, though the suit is not a criminal suit, the charges are of a criminal tendency and nature: it is causa criminalis civiliter intentata. It is the duty of a party before he decides on such a suit to make every possible inquiry and then to propound all his facts at once. Here the party had ample opportunities for making inquiries; he had pleaded indecent familiarities, and a fact of adultery on the morning of the 22nd of May, and had vouched the servant, Tallowin, as a corroborating witness; she therefore must have been questioned as to her observations of the conduct of the parties, not only then but previous to that period, and she is now one of the witnesses vouched to these additional articles. The party had no right to lie by a month and then bring forward fresh facts; there is no appearance that these facts were discovered subsequent to the admission of the libel, or at least that they might not with diligence have been sooner discovered.

Again, there are, as I have said, sufficient facts pleaded in the libel to entitle the party to a sentence, but at all events the Court would not admit new facts unless they were not merely important, but nearly decisive and conclusive. What, then, are the facts? That there were in both beds stains of a similar colour; the colour is not stated, but it is conjectured that these stains were pro-[743]-duced by the silk drawers of the alleged paramour; and from thence they infer adultery. The fact is much too equivocal to warrant any inference, still less to amount to proof, of adultery: these marks are only pleaded to have been observed on this single occasion; nor are there any specific familiarities alleged, nor is there any averment that there was the impression of two bodies in the bed, or any other indicia of the parties having lain together. This was three months before the only fact of adultery charged, and arguments favorable to the wife might be drawn from this, for if such suspicions were excited among the servants, the absence of all subsequent conduct exciting suspicion tends to exonerate her.

But this matter comes too late: the libel must contain all facts that could by diligence be ascertained at the time. If the husband is able to prove his libel, that will be sufficient; if not, it is unjust to put the wife to answer such vague conjectures in an amended libel.

I pronounce against the appeal and remit the cause.

COTTERELL v. MACE AND JAMES. Arches Court, Hilary Term, By-Day, 1832.—On the refusal of a monition against district churchwardens to join the parish churchwardens in making a rate, the district churchwardens, though no parties to the suit below nor to the decree complained of, may, notwithstanding the formal words of the inhibition, be made the only respondents in an appeal, and the refusal of such monition being a case within the third exception of the statute of citations, authorizes the citing the parties out of their diocese. Respondents appearing under protest assigned to appear absolutely. Costs reserved.

This was an appeal from the Consistorial Court of Lichfield promoted by Joseph Cotterell, one of the churchwardens of the parish of Walsall, residing in the borough thereof, by reason that the Judge of the Court below had refused to grant a monition against Thomas Mace and John James, [744] the churchwardens residing in the foreign of Walsall, to shew cause why they should not join in making a general and equal rate upon all the inhabitants of the parish for the repairs of the church, and for other necessary expences.

The parties cited (under protest) alleged: that they had never been cited to appear, and never had appeared, nor were in any manner privy to nor cognizant of the proceedings in the cause in the first instance from the decree in which this pretended appeal was prosecuted, and accordingly that the decree neither was nor could have been made at their instance, as in the inhibition and citation is alleged, by reason whereof they are not by law liable to be cited in this appeal. That in October, 1830, Cotterell caused a citation to issue from the Consistory Court of Lichfield against the predecessors of the parties now cited for the purpose, as pretended, of obtaining a general and equal church-rate throughout the parish of Walsall, but which suit he withdrew upon a writ of prohibition: wherefore they prayed a dismissal with costs.

On the other side it was alleged that the citation was proper; and that reference to other proceedings was irrelevant.

Addams in support of the protest. A suit had not commenced in the Court below: the language of the inhibition, "that certain injuries were done at the unjust instigation and procurement" of my parties, is quite absurd. They were not parties nor privies to the refusal of the monition by the Court below; nor had in any way appeared before the Court. How then can [745] the injuries be said to have been done "at their instigation or procurement." They therefore were not the proper parties to this appeal. Cotterell might have proceeded by mandamus against the judge, or in some shape he might have come here by appeal, making the judge the party. By the second exception in the bill of citations (23 Hen. 8, c. 9) a party may be cited out of his diocese on appeal, after a cause has begun: but here no cause had begun. The third exception, "in case that the bishop or other immediate judge or ordinary dare not, nor will not, convent the party to be sued before him," might apply to the present case. The proceedings should then have been different: the judge should have been the party to the appeal, or the respondents should have been cited in an original suit, on the ground that the immediate ordinary would not convent them. Whiston's case is the only case which can furnish any thing of a precedent.(a)[1] In that case Dr. Pelling wished to exhibit articles for heresy against Mr. Whiston, who dwelt in the jurisdiction of the dean and chapter of St. Paul's. Dr. Harwood, the judge, gave letters of request to Dr. Bettesworth, the official of the Arches: Pelling prayed a citation from the Arches; Dr. Bettesworth refused. Pelling appealed to the Delegates against this refusal; the Delegates reversed the sentence, and ordered a citation for Whiston to appear before them: Whiston denied that the Delegates were "judices competentes," being empowered by their commission only to hear and determine a cause of appeal between Pelling v. Dr. Bettesworth, to which Whiston was no party, and that [746] they had no original jurisdiction. So that the judge was made the only party to the appeal; and I apprehend, from the report going no further, that the protest was sustained. I contend that under the bill of citations, as there was no suit below, my party is not bound to appear.

The King's advocate and Lushington contrà. The application for a monition was in fact the commencement of a suit, and was quite sufficient to enable this Court to cite the parties out of their diocese. The language of the inhibition is mere form. In Whiston's case, the acceptance of letters of request having been refused, no suit had been commenced; but still the Delegates reversed the sentence and directed a citation to issue, and there is nothing to shew that Whiston's subsequent protest was sustained.(a)[2]

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. This is an appeal from the refusal of the judge at Lichfield to grant the appellant's prayer for a monition against Mace and Symes. The usual inhibition, citation, and monition issued, and were served. The parties cited have appeared under protest, alleging that they were not bound to give an absolute appearance; and the only question is whether they are bound to appear absolutely.

The first ground of protest is, that they were not parties to the suit in the Court below, nor to [747] the decree complained of: but it is quite evident that a proceeding against them had been commenced and that a monition had been refused. It is argued that the inhibition is absurd; for that it sets forth that certain "injuries were done at the unjust instigation and procurement" of Mace and Symes; and that such could not have been the fact when the parties were not before the Court. The answer is, that it is a mere averment of form. The monition does not appear to have been absolutely refused; for the Chancellor of Lichfield uses these expressions; "he for the present at least declines to comply with the request of Cotterell, in other words, decides against issuing the monition now applied for." It might have been therefore only intended to allow the matter to stand over.

(a)[1] Pelling v. Whiston, Com. 199.

(a)[2] From a MS. note it appears that the Delegates overruled the protest, and assigned Whiston to appear absolutely.

Again, it is said that the party not having been cited in the Court below is not now to be cited out of his diocese: and this, if unprovided for by the statute of citations, might possibly have been a more solid objection; but the third exception in the statute is expressly in point—"in case the immediate judge dare not or will not convent the party to be sued before him." The party therefore is properly cited in the present instance. No precedent has been adduced to shew that any different course has been adopted in other cases. The case cited, whether the protest was or was not eventually sustained, is not in point. It would be premature to decide whether the other churchwardens can be compelled to make a rate for the whole parish: but they cannot, by now refusing to appear, prevent the decision of that important question which the ultimate merits will involve. The Court, however, can determine nothing until [748] the parties are before it. It is at least desirable that the question should be decided by some tribunal; for until it is decided the repairs of the church cannot be made.

I shall overrule the protest, and assign the parties to appear absolutely: but I shall give no costs; or rather reserve the consideration of that question till the hearing on the merits (see 1 Nolan, 10, 34. 2 B. & A. 161).

IN THE GOODS OF HENRY SELWYN. Prerogative Court, Mich. Term, 1st Session, 1831.—The husband and wife having been drowned together, the Court (the wife's next of kin not opposing) granted probate, in common form, of the husband's will to executors substituted "in the event of her dying in his life-time," the will appointing her executrix "if living at his decease."

Mr. Selwyn and his wife, while on a voyage from Liverpool to Bangor, perished at sea on the 18th of August. They left no issue. By his will he directed that his wife, if living at his decease, should have all his property and be sole executrix; and, in the event of her dying in his life-time, then the will appointed three executors and trustees. No proof could be obtained as to the exact time at which either of the parties died: their bodies were found floating near the shore some few days after the wreck.

Addams for the substituted executors, prayed probate.

[749] Per Curiam. This case arises out of the unfortunate accident of the "Rothesay Castle." Instances have occurred where, under similar circumstances, the question has been, which of two persons survived; but in the absence of clear evidence it has generally been taken that both died at the same moment. In the case of Taylor v. Diplock,(a) which was elaborately argued, both on authorities and presumptions, the Court held that the parties must be taken to have died at the same instant; that nothing vested in the wife; and granted administration to the next of kin of the husband. Here the wife and her representatives would have no interest in the effects under the words "in case she should be living at his death." The only difficulty arises from the other clause providing that the substitution of the executors and the devise over shall take effect in the event of her "dying in his life-time." Without going into the general presumption that the husband was the stronger and therefore survived, the intention is so clear that, whatever might be the strict construction of the words in other Courts, I shall decree probate to the substituted executors in common form; the next of kin making no opposition to the grant, and having it in their power, if they should hereafter see fit, to call in the probate and contest the point.

Motion granted.

[750] BIRKETT v. VANDERCOM. Prerogative Court, Mich. Term, 1st Session, 1831.—A married woman—executrix—and having separate property, over which she had and exercised an appointing and disposing power, can continue the chain of executorship.

Daniel Birkett, senior, left by will certain property to Sarah, wife of Daniel Birkett, junior, his nephew, for her separate use; and gave the residue of his effects to his said nephew, and appointed him sole executor. The nephew proved in 1817, and died, having made his will, appointing Quilter and Vandercom residuary legatees in trust for his wife for life, then for his children as she should by will appoint. He named his wife and Quilter executors, and they proved the will.

(a) 2 Phill. 271. See also Colvin v. The King's Proctor, 1 Hagg. Ecc. 92.

Mrs. Birkett subsequently married Logan, reserving to herself by two several indentures the power of making a will. She survived Quilter, and in Logan's life-time made a will, and died in March, 1831. By her will she gave the property to which she was entitled, or which she had the power of appointing (under the above two wills), among her children equally; and appointed her sons, Charles and John, executors. Charles renounced. John prayed probate, limited, 1st, to the powers under the two indentures; 2dly, to the effects of Daniel Birkett, senior, and Daniel Birkett, junior, left unadministered, over which she had and exercised a power of disposing and appointing by will; and 3dly, to the power of appointing an executor to Daniel Birkett, the younger. A decree having issued citing Vandercom to shew cause why probate, so limited, of Mrs. Logan's will should not be granted to her son John, as executor, an appearance was given for Vandercom, who prayed administration to Daniel Birkett, junior, as his surviving residuary legatee in trust.

Proceedings were pending in Chancery in respect to the property of Daniel Birkett, senior.

[751] Addams for Vandercom. The prevalent notion, that the chain of executorship is broken, is certainly at variance with the cases of Scammell v. Wilkinson (2 East, 554), Stevens v. Bagwell (15 Ves. 156), and Hodsden v. Lloyd (4 Bro. C. C. 533), which will be relied upon on the other side. In Mr. Stevens's will, however, there was no residuary legatee in trust; while here, Vandercom's power, as such, extends to the children after the death of their mother, whose executor now claims the representation.

The King's advocate and Haggard contrà, were stopped by the Court.

Per Curiam. I cannot see on what principle the chain of executorship is not continued: besides, John Birkett has a direct interest; he is the most proper person to be the representative, in order to bring all adverse matters to a final decision, while Vandercom is a mere trustee, and has no beneficial interest, but is the solicitor for others claiming a beneficial interest.

Addams prayed Vandercom's costs out of the estate.

The King's advocate. Vandercom should be satisfied that he is not condemned in costs.

Per Curiam. I shall decree the probate as prayed.

[752] PHILIPPS v. THORNTON. Prerogative Court, Mich. Term, 1st Session, 1831.—

An allegation pleading that a will made at Batavia containing a revocatory clause, dispositive, and duly executed, was not intended to revoke or to dispose, rejected.

Robert Thornton, formerly of Southwark, died at sea in October, 1824. In 1812 he executed a will in respect to his landed property, which he gave to his brother, and appointed him sole executor: and in June, 1819, he appended a codicil to the will bequeathing to his brother all his property of every description. The testator in August, 1819, sailed from this country with his sister, to carry on his mercantile pursuits at Batavia; and while resident there he, on the 12th of August, 1820, executed a will, drawn up in the Dutch language, and attested by a notary public and two witnesses. The will contained a general revocatory clause, and, through default of lineal descendants, appointed his sister, of mature age, his executrix and universal heiress of all his goods, property and chattels, moveable and vested, stock and credits without any exception. It excluded from his estate and property the members of the Orphan's College. A copy of this will (the original having been proved at Batavia) was propounded by Mr. Philipps, who, after the testator's death, intermarried with the sister and had survived her. The allegation was admitted unopposed; and the answers of the brother admitted the deceased's affection for his sister, and that he was of perfectly sound mind when he executed the will propounded.

A requisition having issued to Java to take evidence on the above plea, an allegation on the part of the brother was brought in: it pleaded that at Java the Orphan's College in cases of in-[753]-testacy immediately takes upon itself the custody and control of the deceased's effects, and invariably appropriates to itself at least one tenth of the property; that another tenth at least, and frequently more, is absorbed by the costs and charges occurring during such custody, and the fees and dues payable on the recovery of the remainder by those entitled to the succession, and that such possession occasions great delay; and that to defeat such claims it is almost the invariable practice for strangers at Batavia to make a testamentary disposition, and thereby exclude any interference on the part of the chamber; that such instruments are local from their very nature, and not intended to affect property not situated within the island; that the testator's sole object was to bar the college; and that he was not aware that he was revoking any subsisting will which disposed of his property elsewhere.

The King's advocate. The allegation must be rejected: the Court cannot look at such averments in direct contradiction to a regularly executed and subsisting will.

Phillimore contrà. This must be considered as a question of foreign law, as the will was executed in Batavia. The Court must, in order to decide the question, have the law of Batavia before it.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. This allegation is rather of an extraordinary kind, not denying affection for the sister, not [754] denying the execution of the paper, not attempting to shew any improbability that the deceased should leave his property to this sister who had accompanied him to the other side of the globe, but alleging that the instrument was executed quite for a different purpose—to prevent the Orphan's College from taking possession of his property after his death in case of an intestacy. That cannot destroy the disposing effect of the paper, which is regularly attested by a notary and two other witnesses. It is quite impossible to admit evidence to the effect of this allegation against the executed instrument.

I reject the allegation.

IN THE GOODS OF ELIZABETH BRAND. Prerogative Court, Mich. Term, 3rd Session, 1831.—A testatrix executed a will, and thereupon destroyed a former will, and subsequently executed two other wills. The last will was propounded, but abandoned. A decree then issued calling on all parties interested to shew cause why probate of the instructions for the first will should not be granted; and the Court, on proof per testes that the instructions were of the same effect as the first will, that that will was executed when the deceased was sane, but destroyed and the other wills executed when insane, pronounced for the instructions, and refused costs out of the estate to persons in distribution who by interrogatories set up insanity when the first will was executed.

Elizabeth Brand died on the 9th of January, 1831, aged 80; she left a sister, only next of kin, and a nephew and several nieces entitled in distribution. On the 2d of December, 1828, she executed a will, prepared by her solicitor in conformity with her instructions which he had written down in her presence, and which were then read over to, and approved of by, her. Of this will she appointed four executors and four residuary legatees, two of whom were her nephew, Charles Brand, and her niece, Elizabeth Brand. The deceased became of unsound mind some time before the 10th of March, 1830, and so continued till her death. During her insanity she destroyed the will of December, 1828, and executed three other wills, the first dated the 10th of March, 1830, the [755] second on the 19th of March, and the third on the 28th of October, with various executors and residuary legatees. The two executors (who were also two of the residuary legatees) renounced the instrument, dated the 28th of October, but probate of it was propounded by the third residuary legatee,(a) and opposed by Charles Brand, the nephew: an allegation in support of the paper was admitted, and witnesses examined on it, when the residuary legatee declared that she proceeded no further.

The King's advocate, upon an affidavit of the solicitor as to the will of the 2d December, 1828, being of the same purport and effect as the instructions, and also as to the destruction of the original will, and the deceased's incapacity, moved for a decree with intimation to issue against the several parties in distribution, and against parties interested in the pretended wills of the 10th and 19th of March, 1830; the latter to appear, propound, and prove the wills, if they saw fit; and all to shew cause why probate of the instructions of the will of the 2d of December, 1828, as containing the last will of the deceased, should not be granted to Charles and Elizabeth Brand, as two of the executors.

Motion granted.

The decree having issued, an appearance was given for several of the parties in distribution; an allegation, propounding the instructions, pleaded the factum of the original paper, the subsequent insanity of the deceased, continued affection to the parties benefited till the time she became insane, [756] and the destruction of the paper on executing the paper of the 10th of March, 1830, and during her insanity. This allegation was admitted without opposition. Witnesses were examined to whom interrogatories were administered with a view of establishing that the insanity existed previous to the execution of the will of December, 1828. On the second session of Trinity Term the cause came on for hearing.

(a) In the paper of the 10th and 19th of March she was also joint residuary legatee.

Burnaby and Nicholl for parties in distribution, admitted the sanity of the deceased when the will of December, 1828, was executed; and the destruction of that will while in a state of insanity: and prayed costs out of the estate on the ground that under the decree the parties were fully justified in administering interrogatories, that though insanity had not been carried back to December, 1828, yet that there were traces that the deceased's mind had been affected sometime previous to the period fixed on by the executors; and that the instructions must have been proved per testes against the parties interested in the wills of March, 1830.

The King's advocate and Lushington contrà.

Per Curiam. The parties were justified in, but were not under the necessity of, coming before the Court. I can see no grounds for decreeing costs out of the estate.

[757] SMITH v. SMITH AND OTHERS. Prerogative Court, Mich. Term, 3rd Session, 1831.—Royal peculiars being altogether independent of the archbishop, the will of a deceased who left goods in two royal peculiars, in one of which he died, and other goods in one diocese only within the province, is rightly proved in the royal peculiar where he died. The executor who so proved the will and appeared under protest to a citation calling upon him to take a prerogative probate dismissed.—Quære, whether the probate of one royal peculiar will authorize the administration of goods in another.

On protest.

John Smith, late of Ludstone Hall in the parish of Claverley, Shropshire, died on the 18th of February, 1830, and on 15th of May his will was proved by his executors (under 4000l.) in the royal peculiar of Bridgnorth. John Smith, a son, and one of the residuary legatees, having since cited the executors to bring in the will and take probate in this Court, they denied the jurisdiction, and alleged that the testator died within the royal peculiar and exempt jurisdiction of the deanery of Bridgnorth, and that he left goods within that peculiar, and also within the royal peculiar and exempt jurisdiction of the collegiate church or King's free royal chapel of Wolverhampton, in the county of Stafford, but was not, at his death, possessed of any other goods within the province of Canterbury: that the granting probate of the wills of persons deceased leaving goods within the deanery of Bridgnorth, and also within the jurisdiction of the collegiate church of Wolverhampton, belongs to the Courts of the same respectively. In reply, Bridgnorth and Wolverhampton were not admitted to be royal peculiars; and it was alleged that the deceased's goods in each of the said jurisdictions were upwards of 5l.; that there was also due to his estate divers debts of upwards of 5l. in value within the diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, besides his goods within the respective peculiars; and that therefore the deceased had, at his death, goods, chattels, and credits in divers dioceses or peculiar jurisdictions within the province of Can-[758]-terbury sufficient to found the jurisdiction of this Court.

In support of the protest an affidavit of the registrar of the royal peculiar of the deanery of Bridgnorth set forth that Bridgnorth was a royal peculiar, and that the jurisdiction was free and exempt from all ecclesiastical authority; that it extended over six parishes, of which Claverley was one; that the Court had, as he believed, from time immemorial exercised the power of granting probates of wills and letters of administration of persons deceased leaving, within its jurisdiction, goods of whatever value, and also if, in addition, they left other goods of whatever value within any other jurisdiction. That causes entertained in the Court of Bridgnorth were appealed direct to the Delegates; that, in 1829, the Prerogative Court of Canterbury received from the said royal peculiar an office copy of the will of Robert King, proved at Bridgnorth, upon which the Prerogative Court granted a second probate, the original will remaining at Bridgnorth; and that this was the practice.(a)

(a) The following extract of a letter dated 28th October, 1808, to the registrar at Lichfield, was read to the Court:—

[759] The registrar of the Court of the Collegiate Church of Wolverhampton made an affidavit that Wolverhampton was a royal peculiar: he was not aware of any appeals from that Court; that the probates of wills and letters of administration issued under the seal of the Wolverhampton Court are headed, "Official Principal of the Peculiar and Exempt Jurisdiction of the Collegiate Church or King's Free Royal Chapel of Wolverhampton." That in office copies of wills the copies were always headed, "Extracted from the Registry of the Royal Peculiar of Wolverhampton." On the other side there was an affidavit, dated on the 18th of November, in which it was stated that three persons living, at the testator's death, in the diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, were indebted to him in 90l.

[760] The King's advocate for the executors. Bridgnorth and Wolverhampton are stated in the registrars' affidavit to be royal peculiars; and the averment to the contrary is not supported.

Per Curiam. There being nothing to contradict the statement in the protest, I must consider them both as royal peculiars.

Lushington. I do not object to argue the case with that concession.

"Sir William Wynne, Judge of the Prerogative Court, is of opinion that the Royal Peculiar of St. Mary in Shrewsbury is to be taken as a place out of the province, and he will accept an office copy of the will instead of the original, provided it commences with 'Extracted from the registry of the Royal Peculiar of Saint Mary in Shrewsbury,' and assigned by the Registrar as such."

 The editor has been furnished with the following case:—

Crowley v. Crowley. Prerog., Mich. Term, 1744.

Sarah Colman died intestate, leaving an only child, wife of G. Crowley. A proctor exhibited his proxy for her, and prayed a commission to swear her administratrix: commission extracted on 6th July, 1744, and not being returned, Rous, for the husband, prayed commission of appraisement and monition against the wife to shew the goods, &c. to the commissioners. Monition personally served and oath made of the service, and that she refused to appear and shew the goods. On 6th September Rous prayed her to be decreed excommunicate, and administration to be granted to the husband, giving security. Holman appeared for the wife, under protest to the jurisdiction, and prayed Rous' petition to be rejected, alleging that the deceased some time before and to her death lived at Poole, which is within the royal peculiar jurisdiction of Great Canford, and totally exempt from all ecclesiastical jurisdiction but that of the person appointed by the Crown: that all the deceased's effects were within the jurisdiction of Canford, except a leasehold estate of 9l. per annum at Pudlesome in the county of Dorset; that his client before and at the time of granting the commission was an inhabitant of Poole, and therefore not subject to the jurisdiction of this Court; that the commission being directed to be executed within that royal peculiar without a requisition to the proper ordinary, his client was advised that by law she was not obliged to appear at the execution of the commission; that she is willing to take administration in this Court of the deceased's effects lying without the said royal peculiar, in case the judge shall direct her so to do; and to shew all such effects as are not within the same to such commissioners as the Court shall hereafter name.

Contrà. It appeared by affidavits that there was a legacy of 50l. due to the deceased from a person living out of the jurisdiction of the royal peculiar in the county of Dorset, and also debt by bond from a person living at Winborn Minster, which is another royal peculiar jurisdiction in that county.

Dr. Jenner for the husband, cited 23 H. VIII. c. 9, s. 4.

Dr. Andrew contrà, cited Sir George Markham's case, and The Duke of Hamilton's case.

The Judge (Dr. Bettesworth) was of opinion that he could not enforce the monition in the royal peculiar jurisdiction without directing letters of request to the proper ordinary of the place.

The above case Sir Edward Simpson says he transcribed from the notes of Dr. Jenner, who added:—

"The wife afterwards took different administrations for the goods which were in the several royal peculiars, and an administration in the prerogative for those which were in other places: the whole effects were, as far as I can recollect, within the county of Dorset."

King's advocate. As royal peculiars, then, they are exempt from [761] archiepiscopal jurisdiction. The affidavit and account brought in on the part of the legatee seems at variance with the executor's oath—that the testator had at his death no goods out of the jurisdiction of Bridgnorth and Wolverhampton; but, in reply to the protest, no particulars of the effects alleged to be in the diocese of Lichfield and Coventry were set forth, and the affidavit, to sustain the averment, has been brought in so very recently that the executors have not had an opportunity of answering it. If, however, there were such effects, this Court could not direct a transmission of the will.

Lushington contrà. Gibson, p. 472, in commenting upon the 93rd canon, says, "Where one dies possessed of goods in several peculiars within the same diocese, in that case administration shall be granted by the metropolitan, as they are exempt from the ordinary." Here the testator left bona notabilia both in Bridgnorth and Wolverhampton, and they are both locally within the same diocese. The 92d canon, on which the Court relied in Scarth v. The Bishop of London, 1 Hagg. Ecc. 637, directs inquiry as to whether a party, at his death, had "any goods or good debts in any other diocese or peculiar jurisdiction than in that wherein he died to the value of 5l.," and if so, the probate or administration belongs to the archbishop.

Per Curiam. Can it be maintained that under the word "peculiars" the rights of the Crown have been taken away by the canon?

[762] Lushington. If an exemption had been contemplated in favour of royal peculiars, it is most probable that Bishop Gibson would have noticed it. Westminster is a royal peculiar; yet, in practice, when a party dies within that peculiar, the prerogative jurisdiction is not ousted. A decision supporting this protest will lead to extreme inconvenience and the expense of multiplied probates.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. This is a question respecting the jurisdiction of the Prerogative Court, arising out of the following circumstances:—John Smith died sometime since in the parish of Claverley, in the county of Salop: he made a will, appointing his two sons executors and three residuary legatees. John Smith, one of the residuary legatees, has cited the executors to bring in the will and take probate in this Court, alleging that the deceased left bona notabilia within the province of Canterbury.

An appearance has been given for the executors under protest, denying that there were bona notabilia, and alleging that the deceased died in the peculiar jurisdiction of Bridgnorth; that the will was proved there; that the deceased had considerable property within that jurisdiction, and also in the peculiar jurisdiction of Wolverhampton, but that both are royal peculiars: the protest further denied that there were any effects within the province of Canterbury.

It is admitted that there are goods in both peculiars, and it is asserted in the affidavit that there are also other goods within the diocese of Lichfield and Coventry. Affidavits have been [763] made by the respective registrars of each peculiar, which there is nothing to contradict, and which satisfactorily prove that they are royal peculiars; that, as such, they have at all times been in the habit of granting probates and administrations, and that the appeal lies from them, not to the Archbishop's Court, but to the Court of Delegates. It is disputed whether there are any effects in the diocese of Lichfield and Coventry; but I will assume such to be the fact, for the purpose of considering this case.

Two questions arise: First, whether goods in one or both of the royal peculiars found the jurisdiction of this Court so as to make it incumbent on a party to bring in the will, and take probate here: secondly, whether the goods within the diocese of Lichfield and Coventry found the prerogative jurisdiction.

In the first place, I apprehend that a royal peculiar is in no degree subject to the archbishop; it is independent of him: it is out of his province in point of jurisdiction as much as the province of York or of Dublin: it is co-ordinate. An appeal from a royal peculiar does not lie to the archbishop, but to the King in Chancery, that is, to the Delegates. The deceased, then, having died in the royal peculiar jurisdiction of Bridgnorth, being domiciled there, his property lying there, it follows that the probate there granted is regularly granted, and that jurisdiction is rightly in possession of the will. The fact that he had goods also at Wolverhampton, another royal peculiar, does not vary the case in respect to the jurisdiction of this Court, any more than if those goods were within the province of York. Whether the probate at Bridgnorth legally authorizes the [764] administration of the goods at Wolverhampton, or whether there should also be a probate there, is not a matter that affects the question in this Court. The peculiars contemplated by the canon, and by the authorities referred to, are not in my opinion royal peculiars, but subordinate peculiars.

It is true—and that is the great argument—that the inconvenience and extra expense occasioned by royal peculiars are the same which are provided against in the case of other peculiars by the prerogative of the archbishop: but that inconvenience and expense, arising from the necessity of two probates, where there are two independent jurisdictions, neither subject to the archbishop, equally exist when there are goods in Canterbury and York. All peculiars, even royal peculiars, may be of public inconvenience; but at present they exist lawfully, and possess legal rights which must be respected. The inconveniences have been pointed out, and are such as call loudly for a remedy, particularly now that personal property is so extended: but under the present law I am of opinion that this Court has no right to call in the will, and compel probate here, because the goods in one or more of the royal peculiars happen, geographically speaking, to be locally situate within the province.

Another point has been made, viz., that some of the goods are in neither of the royal jurisdictions, but are in the diocesan jurisdiction of Lichfield and Coventry. In the first place, that fact is not admitted nor fully established; but assuming that such is the fact, it follows that the Bridgnorth probate would not reach to those effects: but does it therefore follow that a prerogative probate is necessary? Would not the [765] diocesan jurisdiction have a right to grant probate; and is not the question of the jurisdiction to which he shall resort rather a matter open to the choice of the executor? Upon the principle of the case of Scarth v. The Bishop of London's Registrar, I think there is a concurrency of jurisdiction when a person dies in a foreign jurisdiction (as in York, Scotland, or abroad, and, by analogy, in a royal peculiar) and leaves goods only in one diocesan jurisdiction, within the province. In that case either the diocesan jurisdiction may grant the probate as the goods are there,(a) or the metropolitan may, because the party did not die within the diocesan jurisdiction; but probably that is not a point which the parties are disposed to try, nor is the Court bound to decide it under the present protest.

The question here is rather between the royal peculiars and the prerogative. The executors are called upon to bring in the will; they protest against being bound so to do. They shew that they have proved the will at Bridgnorth, which is a royal peculiar and where the party died; they have therefore taken a proper probate, and the will is properly deposited. If the deceased left goods in several diocesan jurisdictions or peculiars, not being royal, so as clearly to require a prerogative probate, the executors even then could not be called upon to bring in the will. Probate here could only be taken upon an office copy or exemplification, as in the case where probate has been taken in the province of York. I allow the protest and dismiss the parties.

[766] In the Goods of John Reitz. Prerogative Court, Mich. Term, By-Day, 1831.—The Court refused to grant administration cum test. ann. to A. B. as the attorney of the Orphan Board at the Cape of Good Hope acting on behalf of the next of kin, but subsequently granted it to a creditor, the next of kin having been cited by a decree on the Royal Exchange.

The deceased, a lieutenant under the command of Captain Owen, R.N., died in May, 1824, on the coast of Africa, a bachelor, leaving three brothers and a sister, his next of kin. By his will he gave his property to Miss Stanley, but appointed no executor nor residuary legatee. Conformably to the laws of the Cape of Good Hope two of the deceased's next of kin, there resident, placed his affairs under the management of the Orphan Board (the president and members of which became officially executors and administrators of the effects), which, in November, 1825, by power of attorney authorized Captain Owen (with the concurrence of the next of kin) to collect the deceased's property; and after a settlement of his account with his agent, Mr. Stilwell, to pay over the balance to Miss Stanley. Captain Owen's absence from England and other circumstances had hitherto prevented his making the present application. The property was £220.

(a) Griffith v. Griffith, Sayer, 83, and the cases cited in Scarth v. Bishop of London, 1 Hagg. Ecc. 625.

Lushington, referring to the necessary documents, and stating that justifying security would be given, moved for administration, with the will annexed, to Captain Owen, as the attorney of the Orphan Board, acting on behalf of the next of kin.

Per Curiam. It would be quite irregular to grant this administration to a nominee of an official board at the Cape of Good Hope. The property is to be here administered; and there are several next of kin. Why does [767] not Mr. Stilwell, who is a creditor, apply for administration, on citing the next of kin? Why does not the attorney of the next of kin, or the legatee, take administration? There are all these regular ways, and yet the Court is asked to do what seems very irregular.

Motion rejected.

On the third session of Hilary Term, the next of kin having been cited by service on the Exchange, notice was sent to the legatee, and on a proxy of consent from Captain Owen the Court granted administration to Mr. Stilwell.

IN THE GOODS OF ANNE DORMOY. Prerogative Court, Hilary Term, 1st Session, 1832.—A domiciled Frenchman having of his will appointed an executor but no residuary legatee, and administration cum test. ann. (granted, after citing the executor, to the son's attorney in 1828) being brought in, the Court, doubting whether it ought not to require the ambassador's certificate, ultimately on justifying security and on the French consul-general's certificate (confirmed by an affidavit) that by the French law the next of kin was entitled to the residue, granted the administration to the son without citing the nude executor, he having never applied for the grant, though the deceased died upwards of thirteen years before.

The deceased, a widow, died in November, 1818, in the West Indies: she left four children, and of her will appointed Cremony, her son-in-law, sole executor; but except as to bequeathing to several of her slaves their freedom, she made no disposition of the property. Cremony, having assigned over all his interest in Mrs. Dormoy's estate to the eldest son, declined to interfere further in her affairs: and after being cited by a decree of this Court, administration in 1828 was granted with the will to the son's attorney. The attorney became a bankrupt, and brought in the administration, which was now prayed to be granted anew to the son: but it was objected in the registry that, the residue being undisposed of, Cremony, as nude executor, was entitled to the [768] grant. To meet this objection the son made an affidavit "that the French part of the island of St. Martin in which the deceased was domiciled was, and is, subject to the laws of France: that by the 913th article of the code no person leaving three or more children at his death can dispose by will or deed of more than a fourth part of his effects: and by the 1025th and 1026th articles a testator may name testamentary executors, and may give them the possession of his moveables, but that such possession cannot continue beyond a year and a day from his decease; and if he has not given them such possession, they cannot claim it." That the deceased's will was executed according to the French law; and by that law Cremony ceased to be executor at the expiration of the year and day, and could no longer interfere with the estate.(a)

Lushington moved for the administration.

Per Curiam. If the law of England prevailed in this case there might be a doubt whether Cremony would not be entitled, as nude executor,(b) to the administration: but as the law of France governs the succession, the residue is undisposed of, and the son, as one of the next of kin, is entitled. My difficulty is whether I have sufficient evidence of the French law. The absence of any application [769] for the grant on behalf of Cremony during the long interval of time that has elapsed since the death of the party is confirmatory of the correctness of the son's affidavit and of the certificate. But is the certificate of the French consul-general sufficient proof of the law: should not the ambassador himself have certified? That might have been considered as (a) The French consul in London certified that the French part of the island of St. Martin (W. I.) was effectively governed by the French laws; and that the affidavit set forth the law with perfect accuracy, and in entire accordance with the articles of the code therein recited.

---

(b) See, however, 1 W. IV. c. 40, cited in notis, sup. 205.

adequate authority on such a point.(a) Under all the circumstances, however, I will grant the administration; but as there are other parties in distribution the securities must justify. As the case is governed by the law of France there is no occasion further to cite Cremony.

FIELDER AND FIELDER v. HANGER. Prerogative Court, Hilary Term, 2nd Session, 1832.—Administration de bonis non to a feme coverte granted to the representatives of the husband, an appearance having been given and administration prayed by the next of kin of the wife. The Court directing that though the modern practice had been otherwise, such grants should for the future pass to the husband's representatives, unless cause to the contrary was shewn.

[Distinguished, In the Goods of Crause, 1858, 1 Sw. & Tr. 146.]

This was a cause of granting administration to the executors of Philip Leader of certain effects of his late wife left unadministered by him: an appearance having been given for, and administration prayed by, the niece and one of the wife's next of kin, the executors alleged in act on petition that in June, 1812, in contemplation of marriage, Leader and Mrs. Dawson signed an agreement that her property should on the marriage pass to Leader, save as to "her monies in the funds which shall be for her separate use to all intents and purposes as if she were sole and unmarried, and that the same shall be conveyed [770] to trustees, and a proper settlement executed." That no settlement was made, but the marriage took place, and on her death in June, 1828, she was possessed of personal estate consisting of 2475l. in the four per cents., and some long annuities standing in her name of "Dawson."

The proctor for the niece having returned the act unanswered, Lushington moved that the grant should pass to the husband's executors. It was true that the modern practice had been different, but as all the interest was in the representatives of the husband, they were the parties best entitled to the grant. All the cases were collected in 1 Hagg. Ecc. 341-8, and 2 Hagg. Ecc. Appendix, 158-170.

Per Curiam. Those cases shew that there have been contradictory decisions on the point. On the principle, however, that the grant ought to follow the interest, and that the whole interest is vested in the husband's representatives, I shall decree this grant. I should have done the same if the husband had not taken out administration, unless it could be shewn that he had not the interest, but that the property belonged to the wife's next of kin: and it will be understood in the registry that this is to be the rule for the future, unless special cause to the contrary be shewn.

Motion granted.

[771] LONG AND FEAVER v. SYMES AND HANNAM. Prerogative Court, Hilary Term, 3rd Session, 1832.—Any acts which shew an intention to take upon them the executorship prevent executors renouncing: therefore the insertion of an advertisement calling upon persons to send in their accounts and to pay money due to the testator's estate to A. and B., "his executors in trust," held to make them compellable to take probate, and to subject them personally to the costs occasioned by their resistance; the estate being small and left for two years and a half without a representation.

This was a proceeding by two legatees under the will of John Feaver to compel the executors to take probate, alleging that they had intermeddled: and the question was whether they had so intermeddled as no longer to be entitled to refuse. The facts of the case as stated by the legatees were these.

John Feaver died on the 17th June, 1829, leaving a will dated on the 11th of June, 1829, of which the defendants were the executors. On the 29th of July and on the 3rd of August the following advertisement was inserted in the Sherborne Paper:—"All persons who have any claim on the estate of the late John Feaver of Horsington, in the county of Somerset, deceased, are requested to send their respective accounts and are desired to pay all money due to the said estate without delay to Mr. Symes of Combe Farren in the county of Dorset, or to Mr. Hannam of Darkhourbour, in the county of Somerset, his executors in trust." It was alleged further that Symes and Hannam applied to several persons for payment of their debts, particularly that Symes applied to one Hilliar, and on the 20th August received of Allan 20l., for which sum Symes and Hannam opened an account, as executors, with a banking house, and which sum was afterwards withdrawn by Symes. That Symes and Hannam received and paid other monies; and on the 17th June, 1831, signed an authority to Melmoth, a solicitor who had possession of the will, to deliver it up to another solicitor, Newman.

(a) Lushington. The authority of the consul-general as to the law has been considered sufficient in similar applications.

In reply it was alleged that soon after the [772] deceased's death Symes informed the widow and Feaver that he would not act; that on the 4th of July, 1831, he and Hannam renounced by proxy, and steps were taken to obtain administration for the widow and George Feaver, the residuary legatees; that the advertisements were inserted because the widow was receiving the debts; that Symes applied for no debt but Allan's, though he delivered small accounts to two or three persons; that on the 20th of August he received 20l. of Allan for the widow, and deposited that sum at the bankers to the credit of the deceased; that on the 17th of June he signed the order for the delivery of the will, but afterwards countermanded it. Hannam did not deny that the advertisements were inserted with his privity, nor that he signed the order on the 17th of June, but he denied that he applied for or received any debts.

Lushington for the legatees. The principle of law is quite settled: whoever has intermeddled as an executor cannot repudiate the duties: he has made his election. Swinburne, part 6, § 22. Therefore any interference with the property of the testator binds an executor to the office. Both the executors have brought themselves within the two general rules laid down in Bacon's Abridgement, tit. Executors (E.), 10. In Edwards v. Harben, 2 T. R. 597, Buller, J., says, "Every intermeddling after the death of the party makes a party so intermeddling an executor de son tort." The advertisement was a notice to the public that they were executors; and according to all the rules, principles, and precedents, amounted to an acceptance. If after such an act [773] a party can retract and disavow his intentions, there would be no safety for creditors or legatees. If this and the other acts alluded to do not bind, I know not what will.

Addams for Symes. Directing the funeral, making an inventory of the property, advancing money to pay debts or legacies, or other offices merely of kindness and charity do not make a man an executor de son tort, Toller, p. 41; nor consequently bind a rightful executor to take probate. Symes did not receive the debt quà executor, but for the widow as administratrix. All the acts done are merely of humanity, kindness, and charity. Besides, the Court has a discretion to exercise. It is not bound to compel these parties to take probate.

Nicholl for Hannam. No case has been cited to shew that any acts prevent the renunciation of a rightful executor which do not make a stranger executor de son tort. Now an executor de son tort is one liable to answer out of his own goods for the testator's effects which come to his hands; and therefore must not only have intermeddled with the office, but must have intermeddled with, i.e. got possession or disposed of, the effects of the deceased, as in Edwards v. Harben. Hannam never intermeddled with the effects: he only, while deliberating, inserted the advertisement; and an executor may investigate the state of the testator's property before he accepts or refuses, Godolphin on Wills, 102. Even after having been sworn, executors have often [774] been allowed to renounce. In Orr v. Newton, 2 Cox, 274, the acts for which the executor was not held liable were much stronger.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl [after stating the substance of the act on petition on either side]. The question then is whether there has been such an intermeddling as to render the executors compellable to take probate? There is no doubt on the law that if a person named executor intermeddles, he cannot afterwards refuse to take probate; and if not named executor, he becomes so de son tort. There are certain acts of necessity, such as feeding the deceased's cattle and the like, which do not bind a party; and if a party even has shewn himself willing to take upon himself the execution of a will, he may, in aid of justice, be dismissed by the Court, in order to become a witness; (a) but otherwise slight circumstances are obligatory and sufficient to compel a person to take probate if really executor, or to render him executor de son tort if not really executor. Swinburne in several passages lays down the obligation, and says (part 6, s. 22) "he must beware not to administer the effects as executor." He is compellable "when he does those acts which are proper to an executor." "The most safe course is not to meddle at all, but utterly to abstain:" "the refusal cannot be by word only, it must be entered and recorded in Court."

(a) Panchard v. Weger, 1 Phill. 212; Jackson v. Whitehead, 3 Phill. 577. See also Meek v. Curtis, 1 Hagg. Ecc. 129; M'Donnell v. Prendergast, supra, 212, and Williams' Law of Executors and Administrators, 1 Hagg. Ecc. 148, as to cases where an executor may refuse the office.

[775] This doctrine is laid down no less strongly in several books of common law. In Bacon's Abridgment (Executors (E.), 10. Also Roll's Abr. 917) it is said, "What acts amount to an administration, so that a party cannot afterwards refuse." "1st, Whatever an executor does which shews an intention in him to take upon him the executorship, will regularly amount to an administration." "2d. Whatever acts will make a man liable as an executor de son tort will be deemed an election of the executorship." In Edwards v. Harben (2 T. R. 597) Mr. Justice Buller says: "He can be charged as executor, because any intermeddling in the testator's effects makes him so: every intermeddling after the death of the party makes the person so intermeddling an executor de son tort." If such acts will make a man executor de son tort, à fortiori it will render an executor compellable to take probate.

What then are the facts? Have the executors done anything that shewed an intention on their part to take upon them the executorship? It is unnecessary to go one step further than the advertisements: nothing can be a more strong intermeddling than the insertion of such an advertisement, and expressly in the character of executors. It does not merely "shew an intention to take upon them the executorship," but it is an absolute acceptance of the executorship. Nor was this done by Symes alone, for Hannam admits that it was done with his concurrence; that it was their joint act: and after this concurrence the acts of Symes in a great degree bind Hannam.

They subsequently make inquiries, and they find that the executorship may turn out a trouble-[776]-some business, and then they give notice to the family that they will not act; the matter lies dormant till the following year, when, in answer to an application by letter, they decline to undertake the office. That was too late in time and insufficient in form—"the refusal must be recorded in Court:" till that was done no person could take administration. They should have decided at once; they might have delivered up or brought in the will and given a proxy of renunciation. As the authorities point out, they should "beware" how they do slight acts. I think they have not been cautious; they should not have first acted and given notice to the debtors to the estate, and afterwards leave the substituted residuary legatees without that protection for their legacies which the testator intended. For two years and a half they have left this estate, though small, without a representative or any person even to collect the debts.

I am of opinion that the executors have so far intermeddled as to be compellable to take probate, and that their resistance subjects them personally to costs, which certainly ought not to be paid out of the estate without the consent of the residuary legatee and substituted residuary legatee; nor till after the legacies which have been put in jeopardy by the conduct of these parties have been discharged.

The Court condemned the executors personally in costs, and assigned them to extract probate before the by-day.

[777] DANIEL v. NOCKOLDS. Prerogative Court, Hilary Term, 3rd Session, 1832.—A latter will, disposing of realty and personalty, containing a clause of revocation and uncancelled, is not revoked and a former will revived by reading over the former will, and by parol declarations, unaccompanied by acts that it was his last will—the former will being found carefully deposited and locked up in a drawer, and the latter will, though in the same drawer, lying among useless papers; and all the devises and legacies lapsed.

Robert Nockolds died in June, 1831, leaving his half-brother sole next of kin; and a personalty of 800l. By his will of November, 1819, attested by three witnesses, he gave this brother 100l., and after bequeathing further legacies left the residue to Mary Tomkins, and appointed Mr. Daniel, his medical attendant, and Mr. Bush executors, but without a legacy to either. In 1823 he made a new will, in which he devised a small freehold to Tomkins, and appointed Parkinson executor and residuary legatee. This will contained a clause of revocation, and was duly executed. Both Tomkins and Parkinson died in the testator's life time: and an allegation was now offered to set up the will of 1819: it pleaded that in April, 1827, the deceased lodged with Mrs. Seabrook at Colchester, and continued there till his death: that on several occasions during his last illness he conversed with her, her daughter, and others respecting his affairs, produced and read to them his will of 1819, declared that it was his last will and what he wished to be carried into effect; and that after the executors (one or either) thereby appointed had been with him, he told the Seabrooks and others that they were his executors and would have the management of his affairs: that after his death the will of 1819 was found carefully deposited and locked up in one of the drawers in his bed room, and that of 1823 at the [778] bottom of the same drawer, but much soiled and crumpled amongst old and useless papers.

Addams in objection to the allegation. Every legatee, I understand, under the will of 1819, is dead.

Lushington. Not so. Tomkins' brother, a legatee in 200l., is alive.

Per Curiam. Can you produce a case of a latter will, with a revocatory clause, remaining uncancelled, and in the same drawer with a former will, set aside on the ground of a republication of that prior will by mere declarations?

Lushington. That amounts to a question what will effect a republication of a will of personalty. In wills of personalty no particular form of republication is necessary. Miller and Ross v. Brown, 2 Hagg. Ecc. 210. That was a case, indeed, of a will made by a wife during coverture: but there is no material distinction as to a republication in such a case, and the present—where there are two wills. The principles there laid down are generally applicable to all wills of personal estate; and constitute the true doctrine of Courts of Probate.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. The law, in my judgment, presents insuperable [779] objections to the admission of this allegation. It is not like the case of a later cancelled will, because then the very act of cancellation revokes the latter, and lays a foundation for an inference that the testator intended the former will to operate: but here is a latter revocatory will entire and in force as a revocation of the former, though the devises and bequests may have lapsed. Can the former will be revived without an act of republication, or indeed of re-execution; or rather can the latter will be revoked by mere declarations? If it were merely a will of realty, it clearly could not have been contended that there had been a republication of the former will, because the words of the 6th section of the statute of frauds are express (29 Car. II. c. 3, s. 6). It is clear also, under s. 22, that the latter will could not have been revoked by mere declarations unaccompanied by some writing: but here is no declaration in writing; nothing reduced into writing during the deceased's lifetime; nor are there any acts: the circumstances of the finding are too slight—they might be merely accidental. The latter will was in an envelope; and there is no appearance that it was rumpled—why did not the deceased, a professional man, cancel if he intended to revoke it and revive the former will? Declarations without acts are always dangerous evidence: they are frequently insincere—liable to be misapprehended—not accurately recollected. The case of Miller and Ross v. Brown does not apply. In that case there had been no revocation? all that was there required was to shew adherence. In this case there is an express revocation, and that revocation is to be removed by parol—that is the [780] difficulty. I must reject this allegation, and decree administration, with the later will annexed, to the brother.

Allegation rejected. Costs out of the estate by consent.

YOUNGE v. SKELTON. Prerogative Court, Mich. Term, 4th Session, 1831.—In a suit for inventory and account and to make distribution, on application that an administration bond should be pronounced forfeited, on the ground of a devastavit by the administrator's appropriating the property to his own use, and that the bond might be delivered out of the registry in order to be put in suit against the sureties, the Court (a declaration instead of the inventory and account being allowed) referred to the registrar to report what residue remained to be distributed, and to allot portions; and on such report (which was not objected to) assigned the administrator to pay to each distributee his respective share, and, the administrator alleging that he had become bankrupt and obtained his certificate, directed the bond to be attended with, but declined to pronounce it forfeited.

This was a cause of inventory, account, and allotment of portions of the effects of Charles Schweitzer, promoted by the administratrix of the natural and lawful brother and one of the next of kin of the deceased against his administrator. The citation issued on the 13th, and was served on the 14th of June, 1831. The deceased died on the 17th of November, 1828, and shortly afterwards his brother died; and on the 1st of June, 1830, administration to Charles Schweitzer (Mrs. Choppin, the other next of kin, having renounced) was granted to John Henry Skelton, the father and guardian of his minor children, nephews and nieces of C. Schweitzer, for their use and benefit. The property was sworn under 25,000l. This administration expired on the 21st of July, 1831, by reason of Skelton's son being then twenty-one. Mrs. Choppin's distributive share had been previously paid. On the 1st of June, 1831, Skelton became a bankrupt; a commission issued on the 7th, and on the 19th of August he obtained his certificate, which was confirmed on the 15th of September.

An allegation having been given in on behalf [781] of Miss Younge, Skelton, in his answers, admitting that he had of the deceased's estate converted to his own use 10,875l. 8s. 9d., submitted that his certificate discharged him from the payment thereof.

On this day the proctor for Miss Younge prayed the declaration instead of an inventory and account to be allowed, and to order a decree to issue against George Robertson (the surviving surety in the bond entered into by the administrator), to shew cause why the bond should not be pronounced forfeited and attended with for the purpose of being sued upon at common law. The proctor for Skelton prayed the conclusion of the cause to be rescinded to permit him to bring in an allegation.

Addams for Miss Younge. The bond is forfeited on the ground of a devastavit. There is proof of a complete conversion of property to his own use; then the breach of the bond assigned will be such devastavit; for a next of kin may sue the sureties on the bond and assign devastavit as a breach, though a creditor may not; for that is the effect of what was said by Lord Holt in The Archbishop of Canterbury v. Willis, 1 Salk. 315, 16. In this case the administrator being a bankrupt, the Court could not make an order on him to allot portions. The Court must pronounce the bond forfeited.

Lushington and Dodson contrà. The administrator in his answers does not deny the devastavit, but it is quite impossible to sue [782] him, because having been a bankrupt his certificate is a bar. The practice of late has been not to pronounce the bond forfeited, but to direct it to be attended with, leaving to the court of common law to decide upon the question of forfeiture.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. This is a case of considerable importance in respect to the practice of the Court and the interest and convenience of suitors. If from the rare occurrence of such cases, more especially in modern times, some difficulty should have arisen and some errors and irregularities have taken place, no blame attaches to any party, though it is most desirable that a correct mode of proceeding should be established as a precedent for future cases.

The present is a suit for an inventory and account and to make distribution, brought by a party in distribution against an administrator. In such a case the form of proceeding (when rightly understood) is plain and simple, and might afford a very convenient and expeditious mode of attaining justice; but if errors and difficulties are interposed, parties may be induced or driven to resort to other jurisdictions.

The statute of distributions (22 and 23 Car. II. c. 10), which is the only authority under which the Court now acts, provides in the first three sections that ordinaries who have power to grant administrations shall take bond with two or more able sureties; it then sets forth the form and condition of such bond (see also 4 Burn, Ecc. Law, 286), and enacts that ordinaries shall have power to call administrators [783] to account, and to make distribution of the residue among the parties entitled. Under the provisions contained in these sections the administrator is to perform and to give bond with sureties for performing the following matters:—

1st. To exhibit a true and perfect inventory.

2d. To administer the effects, that is, to collect the assets and pay the demands and expenses.

3d. To exhibit the account of his administration.

4th. To pay the balance, found remaining after the accounts have been examined and allowed by the Court, to such persons as the Court shall assign as entitled in distribution.

5th. To deliver up the administration if a will shall appear.

These are the five conditions under which the bond is given, and on the performance of which the bond is satisfied.

The statute further enacts in s. 8 that no distribution shall be ordered till after the expiration of twelve months from the intestate's death. This provision is for the purpose of affording an opportunity to creditors to recover their debts, and to the administrator to collect the property and to discharge all claims thereon. The mode of proceeding under this statute is obvious and plain, if the statute itself and the terms of the bond are duly attended to. The mode of calling for an inventory and account is so much a matter of every day's practice that it need not be particularly described. It may be proper, however, to consider what is to be done if they are called for by a party in distribution who means to proceed to enforce distribution. Objections may be taken to the inventory and to the account. In [784] that case the objections must be stated in an allegation, and proof be given thereof; or the party may proceed by petition and affidavit, till the Court decides that the inventory and account are sufficient and allows them: but if the inventory and account are not objected to, the administrator prays they may be admitted and allowed, which prayer the Court accordingly grants.

The inventory and account, then, not being objected to, or after objection being allowed, what is the next step? To refer them to the registrar to examine and report what is the residue or balance remaining to be distributed according to the statute, and to allot portions; that is, to report what is the share of each person in distribution, previously deducting all necessary costs and expences which ought to be first paid.

The registrar's report is of course open to objection, but when confirmed by the Court the next step is to assign the administrator to pay to each person, reported to be entitled, the share which has thus been limited and appointed, and to enforce that payment by the compulsory process of the Court, unless sufficient cause be shewn against enforcing its order. The administrator and his sureties ought to obey that order, but their bond cannot be put in force against the sureties in this jurisdiction.

This, I apprehend, would be the regular course of proceeding and its several stages in any ordinary case: it seems quite plain and obvious; and as far as I have been able to ascertain from considering the statute and from looking through the cases, it was the old mode. Special circumstances may however arise in each of these stages. The inventory may be objected to—that property [785] has not been entered; the account may be objected to—that payments have been made or debts entered which are not properly to be charged against the estate. The right of the party as being in distribution may be denied. The registrar's report may be objected to; the liability of the administrator may be denied: but whatever circumstance of that kind may occur the objection should be taken at the proper stage. Injury may be done to the other party by interposing the objection prematurely, or the party may defeat himself by irregularity; and it is always the duty of the Court, in case the matter falls under its notice, to prevent irregularity for the sake of other suitors.

To come then to the circumstances and proceedings in this particular case. Mr. Schweitzer died in November, 1828, a bachelor, and intestate, leaving one brother, a sister, and several nephews and nieces. There was a contest about his will, so that no administration was taken till June, 1830, when Skelton became administrator: and in June, 1831, he was cited, at the suit of Elizabeth Younge, as guardian of a party entitled in distribution, to exhibit an inventory and account, "and to see portions allotted, and distribution made according to the statute." If there existed any objection to that inventory, such as omissa, a wrong valuation or the like; or to the account, such as want of vouchers, fraudulent charges, or the like, that was the time to take such objections; but if no objections were taken, the proctor for the administrator ought to have prayed that the inventory and account be allowed, and the proctor for the party in distribution to admit their correctness, or [786] not objecting to their allowance, to pray that they be referred to the registrar to ascertain the residue to be distributed, and the parties to whom the portions should be limited and appointed. Upon his report being confirmed, the Court would order the administrator to pay.

But instead of this course an allegation has been brought in on the part of Elizabeth Younge, not objecting to the inventory and account, but alleging that it was true and correct, and that a certain balance remained. Answers were taken to that allegation; the cause was formally assigned for sentence; and at the hearing the Court is prayed to allow the inventory and account, and to issue a decree against the surety citing him to shew cause why the bond should not be pronounced to be forfeited and be attended with for the purpose of being sued upon at common law: not to examine the account, nor to pronounce what residue remained, nor to limit and assign portions to the persons entitled.

In giving this allegation the party, I think, lost her way, and the prayer was premature. No blame attaches to any one, the error has arisen from the infrequency of this course of proceeding. The Court itself, without looking carefully into the statute and old cases and maturely considering the whole, might have felt at some loss. However, as I have said, the allegation and answers were quite useless, and the prayer was premature; and it is necessary to proceed with due caution, as third parties may be affected, and in the present case there are many persons in distribution. If it should be requisite ultimately to proceed against the surety, it should appear by [787] the proceedings in this Court that there was a breach of the condition after all the regular steps had been taken; and it should also appear by the proceedings what are the portions allotted to each party. It is convenient and important to bring the matter back to its proper channel, in order to establish a precedent pointing out what the regular practice ought to be, and in order that the rights of all the parties in distribution should be ascertained and, as far as this Court has power, be protected. I shall therefore refer the declaration, the same being allowed and not objected, to the registrar to report the amount of the residue remaining in the administrator's account to be distributed according to law, and who the persons are to whom the portions thereof are to be limited and appointed.

That report having been confirmed, when application shall be made to the Judge to decree payment of the portions or any of them that will be the proper time on the part of the administrator to shew that he is exonerated from payment, and for application to be made against the surety. Before a breach of the bond can be assigned, I apprehend that these steps must be taken. The Court must look to the protection of all parties. Some parties may have received their full distributive shares, and others may have had advances on account. The registrar will of course attend to all these points.

It may not, however, be improper now to observe that there is one part of the prayer with which the Court will hesitate to comply, unless some decisive authority can be shewn requiring the Court to proceed that length; I mean the prayer to pronounce the bond forfeited: by autho-[788]-rity is to be understood either a decision of the point upon argument, or a series of instances shewing that such is the established practice. The bond cannot be put in suit, nor the payment of it enforced in this Court, but it must be sued at law: it only therefore seems necessary for this Court, in aid of justice, to order the bond to be attended with. The plaintiff would then have the same benefit as if the bond were here pronounced forfeited, for it appertains to the Court in which the bond is sued to decide ultimately whether it is or is not forfeited, or, in other words, whether any breach has taken place. This point, however, is open to future discussion; the Court now only makes the order already stated.

The following minute was entered:—

"The Judge allowed the declaration, instead of the inventory, the same not being objected to; referred it to the deputy-registrar to report the amount of the rest and residue of the effects of Charles Schweitzer remaining on the administrator's account, and to what person or persons respectively the said residue should be limited and appointed, and in what portions allotted; and directed all other matters to stand until the report be brought in."

1832.—The registrar's report was made and allowed. On the part of Miss Younge the Court was then prayed to decree distribution of the sum of 10,875l. 8s. 9d. agreeable to the report, and to direct the registrar to prepare an order of distribution accordingly. In objection to this prayer an allegation was brought in. The allegation pleaded the grant of administration to Skelton; [789] and its expiration on the 21st of July, 1831, in consequence whereof he was not amenable to the jurisdiction of this Court. That, as administrator, he had converted the property into money, paid Mrs. Choppin's supposed distributive share; made other payments as stated in his declaration; and had appropriated the residue to his own use, but from the payment of which he was discharged by his subsequent bankruptcy and certificate.

Addams, in opposing the allegation, admitted that Skelton was a bankrupt.

Per Curiam. In consequence of Skelton, the administrator, having become a certificated bankrupt, he cannot be called upon to make distribution of the balance of the deceased's effects. I shall, on that ground, decide that he is entitled to be dismissed.

By-Day.—The facts pleaded in the allegation were then admitted in acts of Court: and on the next session the Court dismissed Skelton from the suit, and, on motion of counsel, granted a monition against Mr. Robertson, the surviving surety, to shew cause why the bond should not be pronounced forfeited, or at least be attended with for the purpose of being put in suit at common law.

Easter Term, 2d Session.—An appearance was given for Robertson, and on the 2d Session of Easter Term an allegation on his behalf came on for debate, when Addams, in objection, was stopped by the Court.

Per Curiam. I am inclined to direct the bond to be attended with: the party in distribution may then, in the proper Court, shew a breach of [790] it. The Ecclesiastical Court, when cases of this nature have been properly considered, has never, I conceive, decided whether there has been a breach of the bond or not: it avoids prejudicing either party. In this instance it is quite clear that there has been no distribution; and the object of the proceeding here is to enable a party to put the bond in suit. I shall suspend this allegation, and direct the bond, entered into by the surety, to be attended with, and produced at common law, as may be requisite for the furtherance of justice.

WATERS v. HOWLETT. Prerogative Court, Mich. Term, 3rd Session, 1831.—When probate of a will and codicil, both prepared by the same person, who was also an attesting witness, was called in, and the executor was put on proof of the codicil by a niece, who pleaded incapacity from apoplexy, without suggesting fraud, circumvention, custody, control, or the improbability of the disposition, the Court (having, on the admission of a responsive allegation, strongly intimated its opinion that the opposition was hopeless), at the hearing, the cause being unopposed, condemned the niece in costs.

Charles Henry Riley died on the 22d of December, 1829, at the age of sixty-six, a widower; leaving Edmund Waters, a brother, and Mary Ann Waters, a niece, by the half-blood. His property was of the value of 8300l. His will, dated in November, 1826, and attested by two witnesses (of whom Mr. Harris, his solicitor, was one), after giving several small legacies (among them 40l. each to his brother and niece), left the residue to his wife, and appointed her and Mr. Howlett executors.

In April, 1829, his wife died, and in about three weeks afterwards the deceased made a codicil, giving a legacy of 40l. to his housekeeper, and the residue to Mr. and Mrs. Price; and confirming the appointment of Howlett as an executor. This codicil, like the will, was also attested by Mr. Harris and by another witness. In January, 1830, the executor took probate both of the will and codicil. After the probate had been outstanding above a year it was called in by the [791] niece; and the executor, being put on proof of the codicil, propounded it in May, 1831, in a common condidit, on which the subscribed witnesses having been examined, an allegation, in opposition, consisting of twelve articles, charging incapacity, was admitted on behalf of the niece. The present question respected the admissibility of a responsive allegation, consisting of thirteen articles and several exhibits.

Phillimore for the niece, in opposition.

Lushington and Addams contrà.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl [after stating the circumstances before detailed]. The allegation, on the part of the niece by the half-blood, which charges the deceased with incapacity, is very much in the usual form: it gives a history of the deceased; it pleads an attack of apoplexy in June, 1826 (which therefore was prior to the will, which is not opposed), a later attack in 1828, and subsequent imbecility: and then the fifth and remaining articles heap together a number of circumstances which usually, or at least frequently, occur in persons who are subject to apoplectic or paralytic attacks, especially about the periods of those attacks; but which also generally subside after a time, and then the patient again becomes rational and capable. In support of such circumstances, persons who accidentally visit the deceased are usually brought to depose; but their evidence almost universally turns out to be of no weight against acts of capacity at other times, particularly if there is [792] no appearance of fraud in the testamentary act itself.

Such an allegation, of course, calls for contradiction, and necessarily produces a long responsive plea, as in this case: and the evidence taken on both sides, after occasioning much expense, generally leaves the case where it found it, that is, depending upon the evidence on the condidit as to the instructions and execution, and the state of capacity at that particular time.

Such seems to be the course of the present case; and the party opposing the codicil is apparently involving herself and the deceased's estate in hopeless litigation. The Court is the more strongly impressed with this conviction from a consideration of some of the admitted facts. First, by the death of the wife the bequest of the residue lapsed, and that circumstance would naturally lead to a new disposition of it: and to effect that the codicil is confined. Secondly, the brother and niece were by the will excluded, except that it gave to each a trifling legacy of 40l. No particular regard or affection for them is even pleaded; nor is it even averred that they kept up any intercourse with the deceased. The opposing allegation, as I have said, merely sets up incapacity; it does not suggest any fraud, circumvention, custody, control, nor even any improbability in the disposition. Thirdly, the person who draws and attests the codicil is the very same solicitor who draws and attests the will, the validity of which is not questioned.

The opposition has therefore every appearance of being a vexatious experiment. The Court has thus early stated its impression of the appearance of the case, in order to put the niece, Mrs. Waters, [793] upon her guard, for she certainly litigates at the peril of costs, not only of her own costs, but of the costs of her opponent, if it should turn out that she has, without sufficient grounds, called in the probate; not even contenting herself with interrogating the witnesses.

The present allegation, being generally responsive and contradictory, is admissible; but, upon the whole, I suggest to the niece's re-consideration whether she will not act more wisely in abandoning her opposition, rather than in persevering at the risk of costs.

Hilary Term, 4th Session, 1832.—The allegation was accordingly admitted: witnesses were examined on it, and on this day the cause stood for hearing, when the codicil being fully proved, the cause came on as an unopposed case, and the Court pronounced for the codicil, directed the probate to be re-delivered out, and, on application of counsel, condemned the niece in costs.

IN THE GOODS OF WILLIAM HILTON. Prerogative Court, Mich. Term, By-Day, 1831. —Motion for an administration limited to a debt due to a bankrupt's estate, and paid into a bank after the death (but not to the credit) of the assignee of such estate, rejected.

On motion.

The deceased died intestate in March, 1831, leaving a widow and a father—the only persons in distribution. At his death he was sole assignee of a bankrupt's estate, to which there was due at that time an outstanding debt of 130l. The debtor wished to make payment: but (there being no one authorized to give a legal discharge) by an arrangement between the debtor's solicitor [794] and the solicitor under the commission the sum was paid into the hands of a banker to their joint credit. A new assignee having been since chosen, the commissioners had declined to assign the sum to him, unless the legal representative of Hilton executed the assignment.

The widow and father were resident in the country—the latter out of the jurisdiction. No administration had been taken; and in reply to a notice that the assignee proposed to apply for the administration limited to the above sum, they declined to interfere. They had not, however, been cited.

Phillimore moved.

Per Curiam. How can the Court grant this motion? If this sum regularly vested in, and in law became the property of, the deceased, then his father and widow are entitled, and they should have been cited, or an appearance should have been given for them. If, however, as would seem to be the case, the money never vested in the deceased, but is the property of the bankrupt's creditors, then the Court has no authority over it.

Motion rejected.

[795] THOMPSON v. BEARBLOCK AND BEARBLOCK. High Court of Delegates, April, 1832.—Sentence of the Court of Arches, pronouncing "that to set out the tithe of potatoes, by the tenth basket, as raised, and immediately remove the nine parts, is not sufficient," affirmed by the Delegates.

This was an appeal from the Court of Arches in a cause of subtraction of tithes brought by Messrs. Bearblock, the lessees of the tithes of the parish of Hornchurch, Essex. The tithes claimed were for potatoes during the potato season in 1828 and 1829. The circumstances in this case were similar to those in the case of Bearblock v. Meakins (2 Hagg. Ecc. 495), also decided by the Court of Arches. In both cases the tithes were set out in prittle baskets; and the learned Judge holding that, under the circumstances, "to set out the tithe of potatoes by the tenth basket, as raised, and immediately remove the nine parts was not sufficient," pronounced the tithes to be one, and condemned the tenant in costs.

From this sentence the tenant appealed to the High Court of Delegates; and the case was argued before Mr. Justice Gaselee, Mr. Baron Vaughan, Mr. Justice James Parke, and Drs. Daubeny, Phillimore, and Blake, by Boteler and Lushington for the respondents, and by Addams and Mirehouse for the appellant, when the decision of the Court of Arches was affirmed.(a)

(a) See Thompson v. Bearblock, 1 Barn. and Adol. 812.

REPORTS of CASES ARGUED and DETERMINED in the ECCLESIASTICAL COURTS at DOCTORS' COMMONS and in the HIGH COURT of DELEGATES. By JOHN HAGGARD, LL.D., Vol. IV.

[1] REPORTS OF CASES ARGUED AND DETERMINED IN THE ECCLESIASTICAL COURTS AT DOCTORS' COMMONS, AND IN THE HIGH COURT OF DELEGATES.

GRINDALL v. GRINDALL. High Court of Delegates, 22nd June, 1831.—An appellant, suing not as a pauper in the Court below, admitted a pauper in the Court of Delegates.—When understanding sufficient to comprehend the act, and an intention to exclude the next of kin, and to give the property to a stranger in blood were proved, and an attempt to shew that the intention to exclude the former was produced in the mind of the deceased by the fraud and contrivance of the latter failed, the Court pronounced for the will, condemned the next of kin (who appeared by separate proctors), the one, who did not appear by counsel at the hearing, in the costs of, and consequent upon, an allegation given by him, and charging fraud and incapacity: and the other in the costs of separate interrogatories to the witnesses on the responsive allegation of two allegations tendered by him, and of the final hearing; but gave no costs as to the interrogatories addressed to the witnesses on the condidit.

On an appeal from the Prerogative Court of Canterbury.

The Judges Delegate who sat under this commission were: Mr. Baron Bolland; Mr. Justice Bosanquet; Mr. Justice Taunton; Dr. Arnold; Dr. Burnaby; Dr. Daubeny; and Dr. Curteis.

This was an application on the part of the appellant to sue in formâ pauperis. The petition sets forth the general history of the cause, the subject of the appeal, and the grounds on which the present application was founded and was resisted.

[2] The act on petition was, in substance, as follows:—

On the 10th of February, 1831, personally appeared Charles Edmund Grindall, the appellant, and presented a commission of appeal to Dr. Arnold, Dr. Burnaby, Dr. Daubeny, and Dr. Curteis, Condelegates therein appointed, who accepted the same, and decreed the usual inhibition, citation, and monition. C. E. Grindall then prayed to be admitted a pauper. This was opposed; whereupon the Condelegates administered to C. E. Grindall the usual oath, but reserved the admission of him as a pauper, and assigned to hear on petition, in objection to his being admitted a pauper. They then appointed him a counsel, and proctor.(a)

For the respondent it was then alleged that Thomas Adcock Grindall, formerly of Broad Street, Bloomsbury, and late of Saint Mary Abbot's Terrace, Kensington, died on the 25th of August, 1828, having first duly made and executed his last will and testament in writing, with a codicil thereto; the will bearing date the 30th of January, 1827, and the codicil the 20th of February, 1828; and therein appointed Henry Evelyn Pitfield Sturt sole executor. That caveats against probate having been entered and warned, on the first session of Mich. Term, 1828, H. E. P. Sturt [3] prayed probate. That Charles Edmund Grindall and John Stone Grindall were alleged, by separate proctors, to be, respectively, the nephews and next of kin of the deceased, and which interests were admitted. That the will of the deceased was opposed and propounded, and the usual allegation given in and admitted, upon which the subscribing and other witnesses were examined. That a long allegation was also admitted on behalf of C. E. Grindall, upon which forty-three witnesses were examined, and that sundry other proceedings were had therein. That an action of ejectment was brought in the vacation after Michaelmas Term, 1828, in pursuance of an order of the High Court of Chancery, by C. E. Grindall against H. E. P. Sturt, for the purpose of trying the validity of the last will and testament of the deceased as relating to his real estate; and the same came on for trial in the Court of King's Bench at Westminster, before the Lord Chief Justice of that Court and a special jury: that the trial lasted for two days, and the jury found a verdict for the defendant, H. E. P. Sturt, thereby establishing the validity of the will so far as respected the real estate of the deceased.(a) That C. E. Grindall did not instruct counsel to argue the cause in the Prerogative Court of Canterbury, but the same was argued by counsel on behalf of John Stone Grindall only; and on the 23d of December, 1830, the cause having been heard,(b) [4] the Judge pronounced for the force and validity of the will and codicil, and decreed probate thereof to be granted to H. E. P. Sturt; and condemned Charles Edmund Grindall in the costs occasioned by the giving in of his allegation, and condemned John Stone Grindall in the costs occasioned by his administering separate interrogatories to the witnesses examined in support of the will and codicil, by the allegations given in by him, and also in the costs of the hearing. And further alleging that C. E. Grindall had appealed from the decree, and prayed to be admitted to prosecute his said appeal as a pauper, which was objected to, and alleged that C. E. Grindall is now an ensign on half-pay, at two shillings a day, in the London Militia. Wherefore it was submitted that C. E. Grindall is not a fit and proper person to be permitted to sue as a pauper in this appeal.

(a) Before the Condelegates the case of Wild v. Hobson was mentioned. It was an appeal from the Prerogative Court of Canterbury, in which Court William Wild, who asserted himself to be a cousin german and one of the next of kin of the deceased and opposed a will, as a contradictor, was admitted a pauper. He afterwards appealed from the sentence, and on the 19th of March, 1811, prayed to be admitted a pauper, when, Hobson objecting thereto, a counsel and proctor were assigned to Wild by the Condelegates, in order that the matter might be heard on petition. The point, however, was never decided, as the appeal was abandoned.

Prayer to reject the petition with costs.

On the other hand it was alleged that C. E. Grindall was the eldest nephew and heir-at-law of T. A. Grindall, deceased. That from the time of the death of Charles Grindall, the father of C. E. Grindall, which took place in Saint Luke's Hospital in 1791, he, T. A. Grindall, the deceased in this cause, adopted C. E. Grindall as his own son. That he brought him up to no business or profession, whereby he might have been enabled to gain his own livelihood, but always, whilst of sound mind, meant and intended him to inherit the bulk of his own large property. That from the time of H. E. P. Sturt obtaining the possession of the person and property of the deceased, in the beginning of 1827, C. E. Grindall hath been in a [5] state of great destitution and distress, having nothing beyond his half-pay as an ensign in the London Militia, the amount whereof is two shillings per day, to subsist upon, and which is less than the pay of a day labourer, and inadequate to supply himself and his wife with the bare necessaries of life. That he hath incurred debts to a very large amount, far beyond the value of his half-pay, if it were in his power to sell or mortgage the same, but which he is by law restricted from doing. That he hath no means whatever beyond the said half-pay, and is in daily expectation of arrest for his debts, and hath been so arrested several times since the commencement of the said suit, and hath been much impeded and injured thereby, as not having been able, in consequence thereof, to instruct his professional advisers, or to bring up the necessary witnesses in support of his case. And further, that previously to the time hereinbefore mentioned, when H. E. P. Sturt obtained possession of the deceased as aforesaid, he, H. E. P. Sturt, was also in distressed and straitened circumstances, as appears by the proofs in the said cause, but that immediately afterwards he became opulent, and was then enabled to avail himself of the deceased's property to counteract all the enquiries and proceedings resorted to by his said party; the more so, as H. E. P. Sturt not only obtained possession of the deceased's person, but also of all the said deceased's title-deeds and papers, and actually procured the transfer of the property belonging to the deceased in the Bank of England into his own name jointly with that of the deceased, and finally obtained entire controul over the whole of the deceased's estate and effects, to the utter ruin of C. E. Grindall, who hath since endeavoured [6] to obtain redress for his grievances as far as in his power. That although the undoubted heir from his childhood to an estate of several thousand pounds per annum he is now a pauper, and unable to obtain any redress whatever for the great injury which he has sustained by the interference of H. E. P. Sturt between himself and the deceased.

(a) An allegation, pleading this verdict, and the remarks of the judge thereon, and the names of the witnesses examined, was rejected by the Prerogative Court. The trial, printed at length from the notes of a short-hand writer, is published.

(b) The cause was argued on the 18th, 21st, 22d, and 23d days of December. Lushington and Dodson in support of the bill and codicil; and Phillimore and Gostling for John Grindall, contrà. See the judgment of Sir John Nicholl, infra, p. 10.

Prayer to admit him, C. E. Grindall, to sue as a pauper in this appeal.

In reply, the allegations on behalf of C. E. Grindall were denied, and protested against as irrelevant.

Mr. Campbell, Dr. Lushington, and Dr. Dodson, for the respondent. An admission of a party to sue in formâ pauperis only takes place when it is indispensable to justice. This case has already undergone much investigation, and the result is, two concurrent decisions (besides a decree in the Court of Chancery) in favor of the will. The verdict at common law was satisfactory to the learned judge who tried the cause. These concurrent decisions disprove some of the averments in the appellant's act on petition. In the Prerogative Court the appellant was condemned in a proportion of the costs; his sole motive for appealing must, it is conceived, either be for delay, or to extract something from the successful party. There would be nothing detrimental to justice if the appellant were allowed to prosecute his case further, only on the usual liability as to costs in case of failure: at least he should be bound to pay the costs in which he has already been condemned in the court below; such an order would come within the rule in Co-[7]-myns, where it is said that, "in the Court of Exchequer, if a person be admitted after commencement of the suit, the pauper is to give security to pay the costs before admittance" (Com. Dig. tit. "Formâ Pauperis," p. 442, ed. 1822). Here the applicant is not entirely destitute; he is in possession of his half-pay, and the income arising from this leaves his whole time at his own disposal. Lovekin v. Lovekin (1 Phill. 179) embraces the authorities that apply: and the principle is of consequence that an individual in the receipt of an income, though it may be subject to debts, yet is not entitled to be admitted a pauper and to have the gratuitous services of others. Riley v. Revett (1 Phill. 184). It was said and admitted, in Taylor v. Bouchier,(d) that a party could not appeal as a pauper: and a material distinction must always prevail as to the admission of a party to sue, as appellant, in formâ pauperis, and his admission in a Court of the first instance. The appellant, here, has nearly the same income as the clergyman in the case in Salkeld (Anon., 2 Salk. 507). The appellant's petition should be rejected, both on the merits of the cause, and on the ground that he is disqualified.

Dr. Addams and Mr. Adolphus contrà. The merits of the principal question as to the will have no bearing on the present question, unless it can be assumed that the decision of the Prerogative Court is unimpeachable; nor has the verdict any application; it was offered in plea in the Court [8] below, was debated, and rejected: it ought not to have been adverted to in the act on petition. There is nothing, therefore, in the general circumstances that have been relied upon to bar the admission of the appellant; on the contrary, in proportion to the strength of the sentences against him, is the application entitled to a favorable consideration. Secondly, it is argued that he is disqualified by his half-pay: but the cases cited to prove that do not at all come up to the present. In every one the income has much exceeded what the present appellant, who is the deceased's heir at law, is possessed of. In the Anonymous case in 2 Salkeld there were two judges against one. There the clergyman had a living of 40l. per annum, and two judges thought that he ought not to be dispaupered; though it is true that Holt, C. J., differed from them. But a living of 40l. per annum 150 years ago was a considerable estate. How different is such an income from an officer's half-pay of 2s. per diem. A living is a freehold; it may be assigned; be sequestered, and money raised upon it in various ways; but half-pay is not subject to assignment; it is inalienable, it has so been decided on a construction of the annuity act, and also in other instances.(a) Even if an officer takes the benefit of the insolvent act, the provisional assignee never takes possession of military pay. The appellant, then, cannot be said to be worth 5l., because he cannot raise any money on his daily pittance: besides this, on the 5th of July the act expires by which this half-pay is secured, and non constat that it will be renewed. The analogy attempted to be [9] drawn from Comyns as to the practice in the Exchequer is not correct; there the rule was applied before a verdict, before the party had been saddled with the payment of the costs. The case of Mathews v. Warner (4 Ves. 193, 4) alone is conclusive against any doubt that can be suggested as to the jurisdiction and power of the Court. There the appellant, the next of kin, was admitted a pauper in the Delegates; the Delegates affirmed the sentence of the Prerogative Court; but the pauper ultimately succeeded in obtaining a sentence under a Commission of Review. That the appellant, in this case, did not sue in formâ pauperis in the Court below is so far from being to his discredit that it shews exertion on the part of his friends to assist him, and an anxiety, on his own part, to avoid an irksome and disreputable situation.

(d) 2 Dick. 504. It would seem, however, that the point did not arise, because it was the respondents, and not the appellant, who were paupers in that case. S. C. 4 Bro. P. C. 709-715.

The Court, after deliberation, admitted the appellant to sue in formâ pauperis.

The case was afterwards argued on the merits, before the same Judges: when the Court, after hearing

Mr. Campbell, Dr. Lushington, and Dr. Dodson in support of the sentence,

Mr. Adolphus and Mr. Thessiger contrà, affirmed, but without costs, the sentence of the Prerogative Court, pronouncing for the will and codicil; and condemning Charles and John Grindall in certain parts of the costs.(b)

[10] Grindall v. Grindall. Prerogative, 23rd December 1830.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. My reason for requiring a reply from the counsel for Captain Sturt was rather to afford an opportunity of repelling the charges of fraud and perjury made against that officer, than from entertaining any doubt on the merits of the case; for after hearing very full arguments on behalf of the parties opposing this will, I cannot hesitate in respect of the validity of the papers propounded.

The question is involved in an immense mass of proofs and evidence, including numerous letters and other exhibits. A multitude of witnesses has been examined, and a great variety of details, spreading over a considerable space of time, has been brought forward; so that it is hardly possible that the Court can minutely discuss the whole with any material advantage. The real grounds of the decision lie within a very narrow compass. If the evidence on the condidit and on the first allegation be fully credited, the will is established beyond all question, unless, on the other hand, the clearest proof be adduced of direct fraud in obtaining it. Such proof, however, is hardly consistent with the evidence of the factum, which would shew that the deceased gave minute instructions and directions for the preparation of this will; duly executed it in the presence of the attesting witnesses; was a person of sufficient testamentary capacity to make such a disposition of his property; and was, moreover, a free agent. In this view of the evidence it will only be necessary for the Court to advert to the general [11] substance of the depositions on the condidit and first allegation, and then inquire whether the other proofs in the case overthrow their effect.

The deceased, Thomas Adcock Grindall, died upon the 25th of August, 1828, a widower (his wife having died nearly thirty years before him), without children, but his only next of kin were two nephews, Charles and John Grindall; Thomas, a third nephew, has been dead many years. Having no children, he, the deceased, had bred up and educated his two nephews, Charles and John; and, intending to give them his large fortune, he had not brought them up to any regular business.

(a) Neither the full nor the future half-pay of a military officer is assignable. Lidderdale v. Duke of Montrose, 4 T. R. 248; Berwick v. Reade, 1 H. B. 627.

(b) For the judgment in the Prerogative Court, see next page.

The deceased, at the time of his death, was nearly eighty years of age; and left behind him property, both real and personal, of a very considerable amount, about 100,000l.; the exact amount, however, need not be inquired into, nor is it accurately before the Court. This property was, for the most part, acquired in his business as a distiller, but he had retired from trade, and lived in a very penurious manner towards the latter part of his life.

Besides the usual infirmities of age, the deceased had an apoplectic and paralytic attack about the year 1816; ten years before the date of the transactions now under investigation. That attack he had so far recovered as to remain in the full possession and management of his own property, and the entire government of himself. Still both body and mind were in some degree affected; his eyesight was defective; his hearing dull; his speech slow and rather difficult; and his powers of motion were to a certain extent feeble. So as to his mental faculties: his memory and apprehension were not [12] so clear as they had been in his younger days, and more especially if he was required to pay any thing. Being extremely penurious, he much more readily recollected and entered into business where he was to receive, than where he was to pay, money. It appears in evidence that, on the occasions of having to make disbursements, he affected a degree of dulness and want of apprehension that did not really exist. The powers of his mind also varied at different times, as is usually the case with persons of advanced age and of paralytic infirmities: his mental apprehension and capacity fluctuated; but that he was reduced to a state of mental imbecility, or of testamentary incapacity, is not now maintained: but it is said he was in such a stage of weakness as would demand very satisfactory evidence of intention, of knowledge of the act he was doing, and of a full understanding of its effect; and as such would naturally excite the vigilance of the Court when inquiring into the factum of any testamentary instrument, more particularly of an instrument made in favor, and at the residence, of a stranger in blood.

Mr. Grindall resided, first, in Broad Street, Bloomsbury; about 1817, at Chelsea; and afterwards at Judd Place, Somers' Town: and at each of these residences his establishment and expense of living were upon the narrowest scale. For about twenty-six years Mrs. Suett, first the wife, and afterwards the widow, of the comedian of that name, resided with him as his housekeeper; but about the month of April or May, 1826, either on account of suspicions, which the deceased himself had formed, or which had been instilled into his mind by others, that she had abused his confidence, and made too [13] free with his property, she was compelled to leave his house; and he was left residing in Judd Place with Mr. and Mrs. Charles Grindall.

The deceased was somewhat of a will maker; there are several wills before the Court; one in 1808; one in 1816; one in 1824; two in 1826; and the one in question bearing date the 30th of January, 1827. Some are cancelled; in one the execution is begun and not finished; it is not attested: another, that of October, 1826, is not executed at all. But it may here be noticed that, in April, 1826, the deceased, not chusing to trust to the cancellation of wills, executed a will revoking all former wills, and disposing of his property, real and personal, in the course it would have gone if he had died intestate; it gave all his real property to his nephew Charles, and his personal property equally between the two nephews. He also stated to Mr. Haddan that he would have that will made lest he should have signed some testamentary instrument of which he had not sufficient knowledge.

The deceased and his nephews often quarrelled, even in early times; the latter had no regular occupation; the former was very penurious, particularly in more advanced life; and did not act very liberally towards them, considering he had bred them up, and intended to give them his fortune. Charles had contracted a marriage with a Scotch lady; John remained unmarried; when Mrs. Suett, as I have stated, was in the early part of the spring of 1826 obliged to quit the deceased's house. Under these circumstances Charles determined to get possession of the deceased's person, in order to prevent, or at least it would have had the effect of preventing, any alteration in the [14] disposition contained in the will of April, 1826, the intestate will, if I may so describe it. Both Charles and John had been taking steps in the course of that year to get the deceased declared a lunatic; each of them had applied in August, 1826, repeatedly to the deceased's solicitors, Messrs. Wimburn and Collett, for the purpose of obtaining a commission of lunacy; though it does not appear from the evidence that there was any pretence for it.

About that time Dr. Mitchell was introduced into the house, under the colour that he was a Scotch friend on a visit to Mrs. Charles Grindall. He expressly states that the deceased at that time was not in a state of insanity, so as to justify any application for a commission of lunacy, and he did not assist in applying for a commission. But it appears that Charles Grindall procured, about the 24th of September, the attendance of a person of the name of Hunter from a lunatic asylum, and that he and Hunter together began to treat the deceased as a lunatic, and actually put him into a strait waistcoat. The interference of Dr. Mitchell, when informed of this proceeding, alone protected him against such treatment: and Dr. Mitchell, with the assistance of some neighbours, compelled Hunter to quit the house after a very severe reprimand for daring to employ this personal violence against the deceased.

That John Grindall was a party to the sending for Hunter, and to this outrage on the deceased, is not proved; but it is proved that in August he repeatedly applied to Mr. Wimburn, with a view to having the deceased declared a lunatic. On the expulsion of his confederate, Hunter, [15] by Dr. Mitchell, Charles was not deterred from pursuing the object he had in view; he gets Hunter back on the following day; and, having upon the night before placed his wife under confinement, he and Hunter together carry off the deceased upon the 28th of September, stating he had taken him into the country, but not apprising any party where. John Grindall afterwards heard he was at Worthing. Charles, however, had carried him to Tonbridge Wells, confining him on the journey in a strait waistcoat, the cords of which hurt him much. At Tonbridge Wells he was treated as an insane person, and from that treatment and situation he was rescued by a writ of habeas corpus; and proceedings were also instituted against the parties engaged, for the assault on Mrs. Charles Grindall.

The deceased was brought back to town, and his nephew Charles, being prosecuted for this abduction, ill-treatment, and false-imprisonment, was convicted upon the 22nd of February, 1827. It is not proved that John, his brother, was privy to the abduction of the deceased; nor is it probable; for he and Mrs. Charles Grindall were active in procuring his release; and John went down to Tonbridge Wells to assist in bringing the deceased to town. But it does not follow from thence that John Grindall was very anxious to protect the deceased, though extremely unwilling that the latter should be in the separate possession of Charles. Their applications to Mr. Wimburn were constantly separate, and though Mr. Wimburn said, "Unless you join together to apply for a commission of lunacy I will not take any steps in it," they never came together.

The interference, however, of John produced [16] considerable gratitude in the mind of the deceased; temporary gratitude, as Dr. Mitchell's expulsion of Hunter produced temporary confidence in Dr. Mitchell. Under the influence of that gratitude the deceased immediately applied to his then solicitor, Mr. Haddan, who also had gone down to rescue him; indeed, even before he left Tonbridge Wells he gave instructions to Mr. Haddan to prepare a will cutting off Charles, and giving the principal part of his fortune to John, but he very soon, viz. upon the 4th of October, declined proceeding with that will; said it might stand over; and finally refused to execute, though, as the instrument itself now before the Court shews, it was ready for execution, and was complete, all but the formal execution.

The deceased, after his return to town on the 2nd of October, resided in his own house; John Grindall and Mrs. Charles Grindall living with him; and upon the 9th or 10th of October a young woman, Mary Gillett, an acquaintance of Mrs. Charles Grindall, was hired as servant to the deceased. These persons were the only inmates of the house.

However, Mrs. Charles Grindall and John soon began to disagree. The former, perhaps thinking that the interests of her husband and herself might suffer if too much power were left in the hands of John, that they might be omitted in the deceased's testamentary dispositions, charged John with having been privy to the abduction of the deceased. A breach ensued, and Mrs. Charles Grindall quitted the house upon the 19th of October; and thenceforward till the deceased left Judd Place on the 28th of December John Grindall and the maid-servant alone had [17] the exclusive custody of him, and the sole possession of his house.

It appears from the evidence of this maid-servant that the deceased frequently evinced great alarm during this time; if he heard a door shut, or open, he eagerly demanded who it was, and enquired if she would take care of him. Upon the 19th article she says, "That at the opening or shutting of doors the deceased was alarmed, and seemed frightened, and used to enquire 'who it was,' thinking, as it appeared to her, that some one was going out or coming in. On one occasion, about a month or six weeks after she went to live with him" (that would bring it to about the beginning or the middle of November, 1826), "he called her up into his room, and said to her as soon as she had got up to him, that he had something particular to say to her. Then he asked her if she would take care of him, and he told her to be candid and speak. The deponent told him she would, and then he said, 'then I will be a friend to you as long as I live;' and continued 'that was sufficient, and it was all he wanted her for.'" So that at this time he was under apprehension, and thought that he was not safe from further violence, even in his own house. Under these circumstances, that he should remove from that house and put himself in a state of greater security, and under better protection, is not extraordinary; and accordingly, upon the 28th of December, he did actually remove to the house of Captain Sturt.

His acquaintance with Captain Sturt arose out of these circumstances: Mrs. Suett had a son, who used during the holidays to come to the deceased's house, and he appears to have become partial to him. The lad wished to go to sea, [18] and through an acquaintance with the purser of His Majesty's ship "Skylark," of which ship Captain Sturt was then in command, young Suett was received on board as a midshipman, about the year 1805. The deceased, from the interest he took in this youth, became acquainted with, and frequently visited, Captain Sturt, and Captain Sturt also visited him; but they seem to have lost sight of each other for two or three years, perhaps longer, before the forcible removal of this old man to Tonbridge Wells. But an account of that proceeding which appeared in all the public papers naturally attracted much attention; for, certainly, an act of more impropriety, to use a very mild term, can hardly be imagined than the abduction of this defenceless old man. Captain Sturt, in consequence of seeing this account, called upon the deceased on the 8th of October, and there is no direct evidence that he saw him again till the 28th of December. Mary Gillett deposes that she never saw Captain Sturt there but on that occasion in December. However, he called and saw the deceased upon the 8th of October.

It is unnecessary to discuss the evidence very minutely in order to ascertain whether, towards the end of December, the deceased caused Captain Sturt to be hunted out, or whether Captain Sturt, of his own accord, called again upon the deceased upon the 28th of that month. Gillett, the only person in the house, except John Grindall, and the only person whose evidence can be obtained, says, upon the 35th interrogatory, "She shewed the ministrant (Captain Sturt) in; the ministrant and the deceased were quite friendly; she thought they were old friends." While Captain Sturt was at the house on that occasion John Grindall [19] went, or was sent, into the city, upon some business or other, and during his absence the deceased, in a coach, accompanied Captain Sturt to Captain Sturt's house, and there continued to reside till his death upon the 25th of August, 1828 (about a year and eight months). There was no violence in the removal, no concealment; it was well known where he was gone, for this maid-servant says that when Captain Sturt went away he left with her his card of address in order that it might be known where the deceased was; and John Grindall supposed that the deceased was only gone upon a visit. He took no legal step whatever to attempt to remove the deceased out of the possession of Captain Sturt, which it would have been competent for him to do, in case he had considered the deceased as unfit to consent to his own removal, or that this removal was for the purpose of taking advantage of, and of carrying on improper practices towards, a person in a state of imbecility. On the contrary, he wrote letters to the deceased at the close of the year in 1826, and in 1827, in which he did not impute any improper conduct, or fraud, or any thing of the kind; nor was he refused access to the deceased when he desired it.

On the 30th of January, 1827, about a month after the removal of the deceased, the will in question was executed. It gives 500l. to Mrs. Sturt, 500l. to Miss Sturt, 300l. to Mr. Perfect, who had been employed by the deceased in collecting his rents, and 500l. 3 per cents. to John Grindall, assigning as a reason for not giving anything to Charles that he had already had about the same sum. The rest of the property is given to Captain Sturt, and the will is attested by three witnesses.

[20] The Court has not thought it necessary to enter, with any very minute particularity, into the previous transactions; because the true question is whether, upon the evidence, this will is proved to be the free and voluntary act of the testator. The evidence to the factum, if it be credited, establishes almost beyond all question that the deceased was a capable testator, that he freely and voluntarily executed this will, and that he had a full intention to do so, and understood and knew what he was doing at the time. There is no room for any of that suspicion which sometimes arises in cases of this description; there is no mistake; there is no ground to believe that the witnesses formed an erroneous opinion respecting the state and condition of the deceased, that they were deceived and imposed upon, or that the deceased was a mere tutored instrument in the hands of those about him, he not knowing and understanding what, or the effect of what, he was doing. The Court must judge of all this from the deceased's own language, from his own directions, from his own free instructions and conduct upon the occasion, from the steps taken and the precautions adopted at this time in order to ascertain his testamentary capacity; by a careful examination of the deceased's capacity by medical persons, some of them of great eminence in their profession; and from various subsequent declarations and recognitions of this will. Unless, then, the witnesses have deposed untruly, it is extremely difficult to conceive any ground for pronouncing against this will.

The deposition of Mr. Hall, the drawer of the will, was read by the counsel who led the cause in support of the will, and its forcible parts were [21] fully commented upon by him; the Court, therefore, feels that it is needless to travel again through that gentleman's deposition. But he does not stand alone; the deposition of Mr. Parkin, the medical gentleman first desired to attend for the purpose of ascertaining the testable competency of the deceased, affords the fullest confirmation of Mr. Hall's testimony. It is also by no means an immaterial fact that the deceased himself was extremely anxious to have his mental fitness to make a will ascertained; and this is not extraordinary; for it is hardly possible, after what had passed after this conspiracy, and the violent treatment of the deceased by Charles, to suppose that the deceased, if he retained a scintilla of understanding or memory, would not wish to make some will in order to destroy the effect of the will of April, 1826, which, as I have said, was tantamount to an intestacy. With the impression that he entertained, or at least with the suspicion that he had formed, it was not likely that John would be the object of his bounty; because it most clearly appears, in the first place, that he declined in October to execute the will in his favour, and that upon the 7th of November, as is proved by an unimpeached and a highly respectable witness, Mr. Haddan, he had completely abandoned, and during the time Mr. Haddan had communication with him never resumed, the intention of giving the property to John.

After the notoriety of the facts respecting the abduction to Tonbridge Wells, and the treatment of the deceased already as an insane person, it was not unreasonable for Captain Sturt to desire to ascertain, by the most satisfactory medical evidence, that the deceased was competent to [22] a testamentary act, nor would it have been safe on the part of Mr. Hall, with any regard to his professional character, to have proceeded to make a new will for the deceased, without taking every possible precaution.

The evidence of Mr. Parkin, considering the repeated opportunities he had of seeing and of conversing with the deceased, removes every doubt of his testamentary capacity; but the abduction and the subsequent treatment of the deceased, his taking up his residence at Captain Sturt's house, and his being in possession of a very large property and intending to leave it to Captain Sturt, rendered every precaution natural and proper.

The will is not hurried; a month elapses between the first instructions and the final execution; the instructions originate with the deceased himself; they come from himself; and Captain Sturt, though he was in and out of the room, did not interfere; he dictates nothing, his only remark was respecting the executorship, which, as far as it went, was in favor of the nephews, and that, it appears, the deceased resisted with great positiveness and firmness. The deceased also states all the circumstances that had occurred at Tonbridge Wells, so that his memory must have been perfectly fresh.

But, notwithstanding all that passed in the presence of Mr. Parkin, that gentleman (not from any doubt that he entertained of the capacity of the deceased, but in order to avoid the responsibility that would otherwise rest upon him) desired that other medical persons should examine him. Accordingly, the deceased was examined repeatedly by persons of the highest character and [23] skill; by Dr. Yeats, by Dr. Thomson, and, finally, by Dr. Willis; each of them sees him more than once, and all of them state, without doubt or hesitation, that he was capable of making a will and managing his concerns: and no act of insanity is proved, although John Grindall, as well as Charles Grindall, wished to make out the deceased insane four or five months before. No unsoundness of mind is shewn; there was certainly a degree of debility from age and supervening infirmities; the understanding was weakened and impaired; but that does not render a person intestable or incapable of judging of injuries done him, or of benefits conferred upon him; he had sufficient understanding to comprehend what he was doing; nor can his full volition nor his intention to give Captain Sturt his property at this time be doubted or questioned.

Against this mass of evidence of testamentary capacity, of testamentary intention, and of instructions for, and the execution of, the will, Charles Grindall, in his plea, sets up total incapacity. That, however, was renounced in argument; and the argument was not an attempt to discredit the testamentary witnesses as to the factum; for that was felt to be impossible; not an attempt to deny the deceased had testamentary capacity; for that was equally impossible in the face of this evidence from the medical persons, and from Mr. Haddan and other professional persons; not an attempt to deny the intention to exclude the nephews, nor to assert that this instrument was by Captain Sturt imposed upon the deceased contrary to the intention he at that time entertained; but that this intention of excluding John, and giving the property to Captain Sturt, was produced in the [24] mind of the deceased by fraud and contrivance practised by Captain Sturt. This does seem to me, after reading all the evidence, to be an utterly hopeless and desperate case to set up, even in argument. It must indeed, under any circumstances, be a matter of extreme difficulty to establish fraud of this kind. Is the Court to suppose that when Captain Sturt called upon the deceased, upon the 8th of October, he was able to instil into his mind such a disaffection towards John Grindall, and such a regard towards himself, that they should without any further intercourse have produced the change in the deceased's mind, which upon the 7th of November, as is clear from the evidence of Mr. Haddan, determined the deceased not to make a will in favor of John (an intention which continued unshaken from that time); and further, that such change was effected by fraud practised upon the deceased by Captain Sturt at this single interview? Even assuming that the deceased saw Captain Sturt once or twice more, it is difficult to conceive how it can have entered into the mind of any person to build an opposition to this will upon such grounds; and more especially when the Court recollects that the deceased was in his own house from the 8th up to the 19th of October with Mrs. Charles Grindall as well as John Grindall and their servant Mary Gillett, and that from the 19th of October to the 28th of December John Grindall and this servant had the sole possession of the deceased; but that the deceased should have been set against John by this solitary interview between Captain Sturt and the deceased early in October is most highly improbable. The probability is, that Mrs. Charles Grindall, who at this time, as I [25] have before noticed, thought it expedient to side with her husband and to implicate John Grindall in the abduction, or that the conduct of John himself, for no other person had very free access to the house of the deceased during the months of November and December, was the cause of the change; and that the deceased himself either through some insinuation of Mrs. Charles Grindall, or on a revival of some suspicion he himself had formerly entertained of the conduct of John, returned to his unfavourable opinion of him; for that he had an unfavourable opinion of him in the former part of his life is proved. John had been in prison, and had been occasionally estranged from the deceased. That the deceased, therefore, should himself have taken up the opinion that John Grindall was in some degree accessary to his forcible removal is not altogether surprizing; for the Court must repeat he was accessary to the wish of having the deceased declared a lunatic, a wish incontestably proved by Mr. Wimburn to have been expressed in the month of August, 1826. That that impression and suspicion should now arise in his mind, while living in the house with these parties in the way I have described, is so infinitely more probable than that it should be an impression worked into his mind by the visit of Captain Sturt in October, that I cannot for one moment hesitate in holding that the fraud is not proved (and where fraud is charged it must be proved); but on the contrary I think that the probability is most decidedly and infinitely more strong on the other side, viz. that the alteration in the deceased's intention was not produced by any fraudulent practice on the part of Captain Sturt; because it is quite clearly proved that the deceased did intend [26] to exclude John Grindall as early as the 7th of November.

Then the previous fraud not being proved, the deceased went to Captain Sturt's house for the purpose of protection upon the 28th of December, without any appearance of force or controul; during the time he remained there no custody by Captain Sturt is proved, no refusal of access to John Grindall; though access was refused to Mrs. Charles Grindall, when she came there and acted with violence, and both to her and her husband, when they came there to annoy the deceased. Considering these circumstances, it might well be expected that the deceased should make a will unfavourable to both the nephews, and should either give his property to Captain Sturt, with whom he had been acquainted in early life, and who he conceived had done acts of kindness to young Suett, who had been killed in action in 1813 when just upon the point of being made lieutenant; or should do what he sometimes threatened, rather give it to charities or hospitals than to his nephews. Indeed, as he himself declared, with respect to Charles Grindall, he must have been mad indeed if he could have thought of giving his property to him after the treatment he had received from him; and if he had unfavourable impressions respecting John Grindall, though John might not have been privy to the abduction, it is not extraordinary that he should exclude him.

That the deceased continued in a state of capacity after the factum of the will is abundantly proved: the medical men see him subsequently; they see him just prior to the trial on the 22d of February, and they think him of sound mind: he continues of sound mind for nearly a year and [27] a half afterwards; he is employed in various transactions of business; there are various confirmations of the will, various recognitions—recognitions not only in conversation with witnesses, but recognitions in his own handwriting, both in 1827 and in 1828.

With respect to the subsequent transactions resorted to with a view to secure the property to Captain Sturt, and to protect him against any vexatious disturbance by these nephews, they have but little bearing upon the real and true question in the cause. Whether they were wise or prudent is not a question necessary for the Court to discuss. If the evidence of the factum had been doubtful, it might have been worth while to consider how far those subsequent circumstances might reflect back and tend to decide such doubt; but the proof of the factum being beyond doubt and incontestable, those subsequent circumstances become immaterial, and do not require any detailed consideration: they will not render the evidence of capacity incredible; they will not shew that the medical men, and Mr. Hall, and Mrs. Jupp were either mistaken as to the deceased's intention or capacity, or that they are perjured.

The Court has perhaps hardly done justice to the case by not stating the evidence more in detail as the foundation of and warranting the sentence that the Court is about to pronounce for this will and codicil; but, entertaining no doubt as to the sentence, I feel myself sufficiently excused towards the parties in abstaining from a more minute investigation of the depositions.

The only remaining question is in respect to [28] costs. It may possibly be no benefit to Captain Sturt to have a decree of costs against these parties; but I am of opinion that justice would not be done if the Court did not make that decree, for the suit has been vexatiously conducted by both the nephews, and at an enormous expence.

With respect to Charles Grindall, no doubt can exist that he ought to be condemned in the costs occasioned by his long allegation charging incapacity and fraud, and in support of which he has examined forty-three witnesses. John, his brother, has thought proper to proceed by a separate proctor, not, as far as I can judge, from suspecting that Charles was acting in collusion with Captain Sturt, but that he might appear in a less invidious character with respect to the abduction: but he has, in a great measure, adopted the acts of Charles; he has even examined some witnesses, two, I think, upon his brother's allegation; he has gone further; he has added to the expence by exhibiting separate interrogatories to all the witnesses examined upon the responsive allegation; he has also offered additional allegations, an allegation both before and after publication; he has also persisted to the very last—to the hearing of the cause, and by putting his papers into the hands of counsel placed them in the desperate situation of attempting to set up no other point than that of fraud and perjury against Captain Sturt; for it was quite impossible for the counsel to have contended that the witnesses proving the factum were not credible, or that their evidence was not amply sufficient to prove the factum. No hope, therefore, remained but in establishing fraud against Captain Sturt to lay a foundation for invalidating the whole transaction.

Under such circumstances it would not be justice [29] to allow these parties, after occasioning this immense expence, to escape without costs. John, as well as Charles, had both a right to cross examine the testamentary witnesses: but for the expence occasioned subsequently, first of all by Charles giving in his opposing allegation, and by the consequences of it, as far as he proceeded, Charles Grindall must be condemned in those costs; and John Grindall in the costs occasioned by the separate interrogatories he addressed to the witnesses produced by Captain Sturt upon the responsive allegation, in those occasioned by the two allegations he has offered to the Court, and by the present hearing.

Whether Captain Sturt will think it worth his while to enforce his decree for costs, or whether he has any chance of recovering them, is not a matter for the consideration of the Court; but a case of this description ought not to pass without the Court marking its opinion by taking that line, with respect to costs, which I have now stated.

Affirmed, on appeal.

[30] HUGHES v. TURNER. High Court of Delegates, 1831.—Where a testatrix had a power of appointment, and a general probate of her will of 1829 and codicil thereto had been granted, the Delegates, reversing a decree of the Prerogative, held that the Court of Probate could not also grant an administration, with a will of 1815 and codicils annexed, limited to become a party to proceedings in equity touching the execution of the power by such wills; but must itself decide whether the will of 1815 was under the circumstances revoked by the will of 1829, and thereupon grant either a probate of the will and codicil of 1829 alone, or a probate of those papers and of the will of 1815 and its codicils, as together containing the will.

[See in Chancery, 1835, 3 Myl. & K. 666. Referred to, Henfrey v. Henfrey, 1842, 4 Moore, P. C. 35; Hughes v. Hosking, 1856, 11 Moore, P. C. 15; Enohin v. Wylie, 1862, 10 H. L. Cas. 10. Disapproved, Cadell v. Wilcocks, [1898] P. 21.]

On appeal from the Prerogative Court of Canterbury.

The Judges Delegate who sat under this commission were: Mr. Baron Bayley; Mr. Justice Patteson; Mr. Justice Alderson; Dr. Daubeny; Dr. Phillimore; Dr. Dodson; Dr. Blake; and Dr. Curteis.

Elizabeth Leighton Bonsall (formerly wife of George Bonsall) died, a widow, on the 22d of December, 1830. The deceased, under and by virtue of the will of her sister, Martha Davies, spinster, deceased, was entitled to the rents, dividends, interest, and annual produce of the residue of her sister's real and personal estate for life, independent of her husband, the same being given to trustees, upon trust, to pay the same to her for her separate use; and upon her death, then "upon the further trust to pay, apply, and dispose of all and singular the said trust monies and premises to such person and persons, in such parts, shares, and proportions, and in such manner as the said Elizabeth Leighton Bonsall, notwithstanding her coverture, and as if she were sole and unmarried, should by her last will and testament in writing, or any codicil thereto, to be by her signed and published in the presence of three or more credible witnesses, give, devise, direct, limit, or appoint, and in default of such direction, limitation, or appointment, or in case any such shall be made which shall not extend to the entire disposition of the said trust monies then subject thereto, and as to so much of [31] the said trust premises whereof no effectual gift, devise, direction, limitation, or appointment shall be made, upon trust, for the said George Bonsall, his heirs, &c.," and appointed him executor.

The will (which contained the above provisoes) of Martha Davies was dated on the 13th of December, 1808; and a codicil, dated on the 5th of August, 1815, substituted Mr. Sharon Turner, as a trustee, in the place of John Hilton, deceased. This will and codicil were respectively executed and attested to render valid devises of real estate; and Mr. George Bonsall, the husband of the deceased in this cause, took probate of them in November, 1815. The trustees were J. O. Trotter and Sharon Turner.

On the 16th of December, 1815, Mrs. Bonsall, the deceased in this cause, made her will, wherein, after reciting part of her marriage settlement, dated on the 12th of May, 1808, she directed, limited, and appointed that S. P. Parson and Sharon Turner, their heirs, &c. &c. &c., should, immediately after the decease of the survivor of her husband and herself, and failure of children, assign and convey to John Jones, Sharon Turner, and S. P. Parson certain monies upon trust, after paying the legacies therein mentioned, to divide the residue between and amongst themselves as tenants in common. In a subsequent part of her will Mrs. Bonsall, after referring to the will of her late sister, Martha Davies, and reciting the power of appointment (as printed above) given to her, Mrs. Bonsall, under that will, and that probate had been duly taken, proceeded, in substance, as follows:—"Now in pursuance and by virtue of every right, power, or authority, to me given in and by the said last will and testament, and [32] codicil, of my said late sister, or either of them, and by virtue of every other right, power, or authority, enabling me in this behalf, and in execution thereof, I, the said E. L. Bonsall, do by this my last will and testament, by me duly signed, sealed, and published, in the presence of the said three credible persons whose names are intended to be hereunto subscribed as witnesses attesting the execution thereof by me the said E. L. Bonsall, direct, limit, and appoint that Sharon Turner and J. O. Trotter, their heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, do and shall immediately after my decease convey and assign unto and to the use of the said John Jones, Sharon Turner, and S. P. Parson, their heirs, &c. &c. &c. respectively, upon the trusts hereinafter mentioned, all the said real and personal estate of my said late sister, Martha Davies, now vested in them the said Sharon Turner and J. O. Trotter, or over which I have any disposing power; and I do hereby declare that Jones, Turner, and Parson, their heirs, &c. &c. &c. respectively, shall stand, and be seized, and possessed of the said last mentioned real and personal estate respectively: upon trusts hereinafter declared concerning the same," viz.: that as to 4000l., John Gould, of Woolwich, and his wife shall take the dividends for their respective lives; and upon the death of the survivor the principal, under certain conditions, to be paid to their children. The testator then gave a legacy of 200l. to Mary Ann Honour Parson; and of 1000l. to her own god-daughter, Martha Elizabeth Turner, daughter of Sharon Turner; and "in trust as to all that freehold, messuage, land, hereditaments, and premises purchased by my late sister, in the county of Cardigan, called [33] Fynnon Wenn, and all that slang, or piece, or parcel of land, in the parish of Llancadarnefawr, in the county of Cardigan, also purchased by her, and all other the real estates purchased by my sister in Wales, in trust for the said Sharon Turner, for and during the term of his natural life. And from and after the decease of him the said S. T., in trust for Alfred Turner, son of the said S. T., his heirs and assigns for ever. And in case S. Turner and Alfred Turner shall die in my life time, then in trust for William Turner, the second son, his heirs and assigns for ever. And in case the said S. T., A. T., and W. T. shall all die in my life time, then upon the trusts hereinafter mentioned and declared concerning the same. And I give to my god-daughter, Martha Elizabeth Turner, the piano-forte, which belonged to my late sister. Also, I give to Mary Turner, the wife of Sharon Turner, all my wearing apparel, table and bed linen, lace, trinkets, watches, plate, china, jewels, and books, which I have in any way the power of giving or disposing of. And I desire my executors to give and distribute twenty-five mourning rings to such of my friends as they shall think fit. And as to all that freehold estate purchased by my late sister in the county of Cardigan, and all other the real estate purchased by my sister in Wales, from and after the events and contingencies hereinbefore mentioned of and concerning the same, and also as to all the rest, residue, and remainder of the said real and personal estate, over which I have any disposing power, under the will and codicil of my late sister, or either of them, I declare and direct that the said J. Jones, S. Turner, and S. P. Parson, and the survivors of them, his heirs, &c. &c. &c. [34] respectively, shall and do stand, and be seized of, and interested in the same, in trust, for themselves, their respective heirs, &c. &c. &c. as tenants in common, and for their own respective absolute use and benefit. And if any one or more of them, Jones, Sharon Turner, and Parson, shall die in my life time, then the share or shares which such person or persons so dying would have been entitled to, if he or they had survived me, shall not lapse, but shall be in trust, and to be paid to such person o persons as shall be his, or her, or their respective heirs, executors, and administrators absolutely and for ever. And so far as the law enables me in this behalf, I constitute and appoint the said John Jones, Sharon Turner, and S. P. Parson executors of this my will and testament. And I hereby revoke all my former wills; and I give to my servant, Mary Langford, Widow, 300l."

This will (contained in ten sheets of paper) was dated on the 16th of December, 1815, and duly executed to pass real estate; and according to the power under her sister's will.

On the 31st of March, 1818, Mrs. Bonsall made a codicil, republishing her will; and desiring, that in case she should die before her sister's monument was put up, that it should be paid for by her executors out of the property bequeathed to them by her will.

On the 20th of March, 1819, she made a second codicil, wherein, after reciting the appointment by her will, in virtue of her marriage settlement, to Jones, Turner, and Parson; and that Parson was dead leaving only one child amply provided for, she gave Parson's share to her husband if he should survive, confirmed the appointment of the other two shares to Jones and Turner; and also, after reciting the appointment by her [35] will, in virtue of her sister's will, to Jones, Turner, and Parson, "upon the trusts therein declared, and amongst others, as to 4000l. for the benefit of John Gould and his family, as to 200l. for Mary Ann Honour Parson, as to 1000l. for my god-daughter therein mentioned, and as to the freehold premises at Fynnon Wenn and Llancadarnefawr, for Sharon Turner and his sons: and as to the piano forte of my said sister, for my said god-daughter; and as to my wearing apparel, table and bed linen, lace, trinkets, watches, plate, china, jewels, and books, to Mary Turner, wife of the said Sharon Turner; and as to all the rest, residue, and remainder of my said real and personal estate over which I had any disposing power, under the will and codicil of my said sister, I gave, directed, limited, and appointed the same unto them, Jones, Turner, and Parson;" she gave Parson's share of this residue to her husband, George Bonsall, if he should survive her, to and for his own absolute use and benefit. The testatrix then confirmed the appointment of the two parts of the residue to Jones and Turner, and proceeded: "And I also give, direct, limit, and appoint to my said husband, for and during the term of his natural life, all that the said freehold messuage, lands, hereditaments, and premises at Fynnon Wenn and at Llancadarne fawr, with liberty to cut the wood on the same for his own use; and after his decease, then I give and appoint the same to the said S. Turner, and to his sons Alfred and William, their heirs and assigns, as mentioned and appointed by my said will. And I give and appoint to the said George Bonsall, the carriages and horses, and all the household furniture, books, plate, and linen, over which I have any disposing power, for his own absolute use and benefit; but the piano forte, wearing apparel, lace, [36] trinkets, watches, jewels, and other effects, I give and appoint to the said Martha Elizabeth Turner, and Mary Turner, as mentioned in my said will. And I will and appoint that all funeral and testamentary expenses, and that the costs of my sister's monument and my own, be paid for out of the said last mentioned rest and residue, before the same is divided, and I revoke and annul the said sum of 200l. given to the said Mary Ann Honour Parson, and also the sum of 300l. given by my said will to Mary Langford, and instead thereof, I direct my executors to pay to the said Mary Langford the sum of five pounds a year during the term of her life, out of the said residue: and I appoint the said John Jones and Sharon Turner executors of my said will, and I confirm my said will, and the codicil thereto annexed, in all respects in which the same have not been altered by this my last codicil; and do declare the said will and codicil to be, with this present codicil, my last will and testament, and I revoke all others."

On the 22nd of October, 1824, she made a third codicil, whereby, after reciting the death of her late husband, she bequeathed "to her other surviving executors and trustees all that by my codicils I heretofore gave and bequeathed unto George Bonsall, to their own use and benefit; but subject, &c. &c. and in all other respects I confirm and do hereby republish my will with the former codicils added thereto."

These codicils were respectively duly executed.

On the 26th of October, 1829, Mrs. Bonsall made a further will, the substance of which was as follows:—

"This is the last will and testament of me Elizabeth Leighton Bonsall, of Queen Square, Bloomsbury, widow." (After certain directions respecting [37] her funeral and monument.) "I desire that my funeral and testamentary expenses be first paid, and then I give unto my friend Mrs. Mary Lawrence, of Keppel Street, 500l. and also my best set of pearls, for her own sole and separate use, free, &c. To my friend Mrs. Mary White, of Montague Place, 500l. and also all my trinkets (except the set of pearls bequeathed as aforesaid, and my watches). To my friend Mrs. Scarborough, 500l. and also a plain gold watch (which belonged to my sister), for own sole and separate use, free, &c. To my friend Mrs. Hawkins, sister to Mr. Jonathan Hayne, of Red Lion Street, 300l. To my friend Miss Hinds, my companion, 300l. and also all my furniture, clocks, watches, books, pictures, glass, linen, and wearing apparel, and my piano forte and music books. To my friend Mr. Jonathan Hayne aforesaid, silversmith, 500l. To my friend Mr. Sharon Turner, 50l. and to Mr. Alfred Turner, his son, 50l. To my friend Mr. John Gould, of Brompton, Kent, solicitor, 3000l.; but if the said John Gould should happen to die before me, then I will that the said 3000l. be equally divided between and amongst such of the children of the said John Gould as shall be living at the time of my decease. I give, devise, and bequeath all my freehold and copyhold estates in the county of Middlesex, in Cardigan, and elsewhere, unto my relation John Jones, of Ystrad, in the county of Carmarthen, esquire, member of Parliament, his heirs and assigns for ever. And as to all the rest, residue, and remainder of my estates and effects, whatsoever or wheresoever, whether real or personal, plate, monies, leasehold, mortgages, bonds, or other securities for money stocks, funds, or other property, and whether in possession, reversion, or [38] expectancy, or held in trust for me, I give, devise, and bequeath the same, and every part thereof, unto the said John Jones, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns for ever. And I do hereby nominate the said John Jones, and the aforesaid Jonathan Hayne, executors of this my will, at the same time revoking and making void all and every other will and wills by me at any time heretofore made, and declaring this only to be my last Will and Testament. In witness whereof, I, the said E. L. Bonsall, have to this my last Will and Testament contained in three sheets of paper, set my hand and seal, this 26th of October, 1829.

"Elizabeth Leighton Bonsall" (L.S.).

There was a regular attestation clause; and the will was attested by William Young, Charlotte Row, Mansion House, solicitor; and two of his clerks.

"This is a codicil to my last will and testament. I give to Sharon Turner, Esquire, 3000l., at his death to be equally divided between his family; 500l. in addition to the 500l. already left, to Mrs. Mary Lawrence, for her sole and separate use; 100l. lent to John Leslie to be given to him, and not called for; to my servant Mary Mark, 20l.: to Miss William, daughter of Doctor Rice William, of Brydge Street, Aberystwith, 300l."

This codicil was dated the 14th of June, 1830; and signed and attested by three witnesses.

Prerogative Court.—On the 25th of February, 1831, Mr. Jones and Mr. Hayne proved, in the Prerogative Court, the will, dated on the 26th of October, 1829, and the codicil thereto.

[39] Shortly after this probate had been taken, Mary, wife of James Hughes, the appellant, devisee for life of the real estate of George Bonsall, and also his sister and next of kin, filed a bill of complaint in Chancery against Sharon Turner, the surviving trustee under the will of Martha Davies, also against Jones and Hayne, the executors of Mrs. Bonsall, and also against the Reverend Isaac Bonsall, the administrator (with the will annexed) of George Bonsall, in order to obtain a decree whether Mrs. Bonsall's said last will and codicil contained a valid appointment of the estate and effects of Martha Davies, and also for the due and proper application thereof. This suit was still depending.

In April, 1831, a decree issued under seal of the Prerogative Court, at the instance of Sharon Turner, against Jones and Hayne, calling upon them to bring into the registry the probate which they had obtained, and to shew cause why it should not be revoked, and probate of both wills, and of the several codicils thereto, should not be granted, as containing together the last will of the deceased, or in such other manner and form as the Judge of the said Court should direct.

An appearance having been given for Jones and Hayne, an allegation of twelve articles was given on behalf of Turner, pleading "the contents of the will of Martha Davies, also the making and execution of the will (of 16th December, 1815) and codicils thereto of Elizabeth Bonsall, and that she had by them made a complete and effectual disposition and appointment of her own real and personal estate, and of the real and personal estate of Martha Davies, over which she, Bonsall, had a disposing power." It further pleaded "the making and writing of the will (whereof probate had been [40] granted to Jones and Hayne) by William Young, and that he, Young, was in total ignorance at such time that Mrs. Bonsall had the power of appointment contained in her sister's will, and that having prepared the same under the impression that Mrs. Bonsall had thereby made a complete disposition of all the estate and effects which could pass under any will, he inserted a clause of revocation."

"That (under the circumstances pleaded) several questions had arisen which could be decided only by a Court of Equity, viz., whether the will of 26th October, 1829, is a good execution of the power of appointment to be exercised by will over the estate and effects of Martha Davies, given by her to Mrs. Bonsall, by reason that in the will of 26th of October, 1829, no reference is specially made to the power. 2ndly, whether in the event of the said will being deemed not to be a good execution of the power, so as to convey the property of the said Martha Davies according to the disposition therein contained, the will ought, by reason of the general revocatory clause therein mentioned, to have the effect of revoking the previous execution of the power contained in the will of the 16th of December, 1815, and the codicils thereto. That there were also several other questions arising upon the said power of appointment, and the exercise or presumed exercise thereof, fit and proper to be decided by a Court of Equity."

"That according to the rules of the Court of Equity, in cases where a power of appointment over personal property is to be exercised by will, those Courts will not receive any paper being or purporting to be a testamentary execution of such power, or a testamentary revocation of an execution of such power, unless the paper had received [41] probate from an Ecclesiastical Court, and that by reason of the premises, unless probate were in some form granted of the testamentary papers therein set forth, the questions before stated could not be adjudicated or justice done in a Court of Equity." (a)

The prayer of the allegation was, that the Court would grant probate of all Mrs. Bonsall's testamentary papers thereinbefore pleaded in such form as justice might require, and so as to enable a Court of Equity to decide all necessary questions, and give the necessary directions for administering the trust funds of Martha Davies.

This allegation was admitted without opposition, and the facts and circumstances therein pleaded were afterwards confessed by Jones and Hayne in acts of Court.

The cause came on for hearing on the 3rd Session of Easter Term, 1831, when the proctor for Jones and Hayne, who stood assigned to bring in the probate of the deceased's last will and codicil, prayed the Court not to enforce the assignation in respect to such probate upon him. The Court directed that such probate should not be brought in; and under the special circumstances of the case, and as not affecting the general rule, "decreed letters of administration with the will, bearing date the 16th day of December, 1815, and the three codicils annexed, to be granted to the nominee of Sharon Turner, one of the executors named in the second codicil, limited only to become a party to, and to attend, supply, substantiate, and confirm proceedings in the Court of Chancery, or [42] any other Court of Equity, touching and concerning the execution of the power of appointment, under the wills and codicils of the said deceased, or either of them." But the Court directed that the limited administration to Turner's nominee should be without prejudice to the probate taken of the latter will by Jones and Hayne.

Before this grant of limited administration had passed the seal a caveat was entered on the part of Mrs. Hughes; an appearance was given for her alleging that she was the natural and lawful sister, next of kin, and one of the persons entitled in distribution to the effects undisposed of by the will of George Bonsall, and as such a party entitled to the residue of the estate and effects of Martha Davies, there being no appointment made thereof by Mrs. Bonsall; and a prayer was made on her (Mrs. Hughes's) behalf to be heard on petition against the grant of administration as decreed.

(a) A Court of Equity has no jurisdiction to determine on the validity of a will. Jones v. Jones, 3 Mer. 161. Jones v. Frost, Jacob, 467. Pemberton v. Pemberton, 13 Ves. 297. Kerrich v. Bransby, 7 Bro. P. C. 437. See also Williams on Executors, vol. 1, p. 157-8.

The act on petition, after a formal heading on the part of Turner, alleged for Mrs. Hughes: "That the decree of the Prerogative Court, dated on the third session of Easter Term last (to wit, the 7th of May, 1831), was obtained by collusion between Sharon Turner, John Jones, and Jonathan Hayne, they, or at least two of them, being the parties severally interested in obtaining a grant of letters of administration (with the will of the 16th of December, 1815, and codicils annexed) of Mrs. Bonsall, the deceased, the same being to be made use of for their benefit in the Court of Chancery, in the suit instituted in that Court by Mary Hughes,(a) they, Turner and Jones, being the parties respectively in whose favor Mrs. Bonsall had by her will of 1815, and codicils thereto, made an appointment [43] of the principal part of the property of Martha Davies (the same being of large amount), over which she had a disposing power, and Jones and Hayne, the executors under the latter will of 1830, accordingly at once admitting all the facts and circumstances pleaded on behalf of Sharon Turner to be true. That notwithstanding such the interest of Turner and Jones, and that he, Turner, has since the commencement of the suit in Chancery acted, and still continues to act, as solicitor both on his own part, and also on the part of Jones and Hayne, as of the Reverend Isaac Bonsall, yet that he, Turner, did not give any notice to Mary Hughes, or her solicitor, in the Chancery suit, of the proceedings in this Court, and they remained in ignorance thereof until the 27th of May, 1831, when, by the answer of Turner to the bill in Chancery, Mary Hughes's solicitor first discovered that a special probate of the former will and codicils of Mrs. Bonsall had been, or was about to be, granted. That any grant issued by the authority of this Court recognizing in any manner the said former will and codicils thereto as an existing will and codicils of the deceased, will prejudice Mary Hughes in her suit in Chancery; wherefore the Judge of this Court was prayed to rescind his aforesaid decree, made on the third session of Easter Term last, in the pretended cause promoted by Turner against Jones and Hayne."

On the part of Turner—denying "that Mary Hughes is a party entitled to the residue of the estate and effects of the said Martha Davies—it was expressly alleged that the said Mrs. Bonsall did make a full and effectual appointment thereof. And it was further alleged, that the cause in this Court, between Turner v. Jones and Hayne, was [44] promoted for the express purpose of obtaining the decree of the Lord Chancellor whether Mrs. Bonsall, deceased, had or had not by either of the aforesaid wills or codicils made an effectual appointment of the residue of the estate and effects of Martha Davies, deceased, either in the suit now depending in the Court of Chancery, or in some other suit to be commenced in the said Court wherein the several persons interested in the issue thereof were intended to be made parties. And it was expressly denied that the decree of this Court was obtained by collusion between Turner, Jones, and Hayne. It was alleged that the interests of the said parties are untruly set forth and alleged on behalf of Mary Hughes; for that although Sharon Turner, and Jones, were the persons in whose favour Mrs. Bonsall had by her will of the 16th of December, 1815, and three codicils thereto, made an appointment of the principal part of the property, and which it is contended by Turner is a full and effectual appointment thereof, yet Jones, as the residuary legatee named in the will of Mrs. Bonsall, dated the 26th of October, 1829, contends that he is entitled to, and by his answers to the bill filed by Mary Hughes in Chancery, claims the whole of the residue of Martha Davies' real and personal estate. That Jones, in his said answer, sets forth that Mrs. Bonsall, by her said will, had devised (among other things) her freehold estates in the county of Cardigan, and that she was not possessed of, or entitled to, any freehold estate in that county, except under the will of her sister, Martha Davies; that by her said will she had given the gold watch, a piano-forte, and music books, which formerly belonged to Martha Davies, and after [45] giving other legacies, gave and devised all the residue of her estate and effects, whether in possession, reversion, or expectancy, or held in trust for her. And Jones therefore insists that Mrs. Bonsall had by her will of 1829 sufficiently referred or alluded to the will of Martha Davies, or to the estate and effects thereby devised and bequeathed, to render her said will an effectual appointment thereof, and that he, Jones, is consequently entitled thereto, that hence the interests of Turner and Jones are distinct, and opposed to each other; and that they had no motive for colluding, and did not in fact collude. That Jones and Hayne did, in the cause in this Court, acknowledge the facts and circumstances pleaded therein, on behalf of Turner, to be true, and he expressly alleged that such facts and circumstances are true, and if they had been denied might have been readily proved on oath. That Turner has acted, and still does act, as solicitor (as alleged), and that he had acted for the Reverend Isaac Bonsall as his solicitor in other matters, previously to the commencement of the said suit in Chancery, and he still continues to act for him at his particular request. That Jones and Bonsall have each a separate counsel in the said suit. That the said Reverend Isaac Bonsall is the brother of Mary Hughes, and has an equal interest with her, if any, under the will of Martha Davies, deceased. That no notice was given to Mary Hughes of the cause lately depending in this Court, because it was instituted for the sole object of enabling the Court of Chancery either under the bill filed by her, or a new bill if necessary, to take into consideration the several testamentary papers left by the said Elizabeth Leighton Bonsall, deceased, and not for [46] the purpose of obtaining a decision of this Court affecting her interest. That justice cannot be administered to the several parties interested, under the testamentary papers of Mrs. Bonsall, without some grant under seal of this Court with her will bearing date the 16th of December, 1815, and the three codicils thereto annexed; and that the grant decreed by this Court on the third session of Easter Term last past will enable the Court of Chancery to enter fully into the merits of the case between all parties interested: wherefore the said decree was prayed to be enforced with costs."

(a) The words printed in italics are in conformity with the printed papers in the cause.

By-Day.—On this day the petition came on for hearing.

Addams for Mrs. Hughes. The object of the petition is to enable Mrs. Hughes to set up the papers of December, 1815, and of October, 1829, as together containing the will of the deceased: this question is purely for this Court to decide, and not for a Court of Equity.

Per Curiam. By refusing to direct the general probate of the will of 1829 to be brought in, and to grant probate of all the papers, I virtually held the will of 1815 revoked.

Lushington contrà. No injustice will accrue by the confirmation of the decree of limited administration. The object of the other side is to prevent the only Court—the Court of Chancery—from deciding upon the claims of the different parties.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. In granting a limited administration, under the [47] special circumstances of this case, I proposed to put the whole matter in such a shape that the opinion of a Court of Equity might be taken as to the validity of the appointment under Martha Davies' will. A Court of Equity is, I conceive, the fittest jurisdiction to decide that question. As Mrs. Hughes was not before the Court when that decree was made, it has been competent for her to shew that she is prejudiced by it, or that it was made under an erroneous statement of facts; but her petition does not satisfy me that the decree should be rescinded. I will, however, allow the matter of the limited grant of administration to stand over for consideration as to any further limitation which may assist in more completely effectuating the object of the Court.

From this decree the cause was appealed to the Court of Delegates.

Delegates, November 25.—Mr. Pepys, Dr. Addams, and Mr. Griffith Richards for Mrs. Hughes the appellant.(a) The argument, in the first instance, is confined to one point, viz., whether the limited administration with the will of 1815 and codicils can be [48] supported. The object of the Ecclesiastical Court was to have a particular question decided in the Court of Chancery; but the case belongs completely to the Ecclesiastical Court; and it cannot devolve upon any other Court to say which is the last will of the testatrix. Where the question is whether a paper be or be not testamentary, that question is exclusively for the Ecclesiastical Court. Other Courts may decide as to what may be the effect of a testamentary paper; that is another question. There are now, in effect, two (a) Some discussion took place as to which party should be first heard.

---

Addams admitted that it was usual in such a case for the appellant to be first heard; but suggested a distinction in this case, inasmuch as the other party had begun the act on petition.

Lushington contrà. It was Mrs. Hughes who prayed to be heard on petition; and though my party first wrote to it, it was a mere formal statement, and Dr. Addams was first heard in the Prerogative Court.

The Court directed the appellant's counsel to begin.

probates of two last wills. The will of 1829 is stated by the testatrix to be her last will; it is so headed and concluded: the testatrix has therefore declared her intention. This will may leave the power unexecuted, or it may be an execution of the power; but, it having received probate, the instrument is ripe for the consideration of a Court of Equity. Mr. Turner applied to the Prerogative Court to recall its probate of the will of 1829: this was a very legitimate object, if there were grounds for the application, and proper parties before the Court: but the party applying and the parties opposing had, in fact, the same interests, viz., that of upholding the will of 1815. The Court declined to revoke the probate of the will of 1829; but granted an administration with a will dated in 1815: this latter grant must be a nullity. There cannot be two last wills. And the Prerogative Court, having granted probate of the will of 1829, decided that it was the last will; and it therefore was bound to have rejected the paper of 1815. The Court of Chancery probably will reject it, or take no notice of it unless to send it back to the Court of Probate. In Rich v. Cockell something [49] of a similar nature occurred;(a) but in that case the question of probate still remained in contest; there was no inconsistency as in this case, where the second decree is in direct opposition to the former. If the executors of the will of 1829 wish to raise a question as to whether the will of 1829 is or is not a revocation of the will of 1815, we do not object; only let it be done in the proper Court—the Court of Probate.

Bayley, B. Can this Court decide whether a probate of the two instruments, as together containing the will, ought to be granted?

Per Counsel. Not at present. The executors under the will of 1829 are not before the Court. Such an application may hereafter be made.

Dr. Lushington and Mr. Loraine contrà. Unless a limited administration of the will of 1815, such as has been already granted, be sustained, the Court of Chancery can have no knowledge whether the power has been duly executed. How, without the will of 1815 before it, can that Court decide whether the will of 1829 revoked it? The question depends on the due execution of a power. It will be admitted that the Ecclesiastical Court has no authority to decree the execution of a trust (see Ex-parte Jenkins, 1 B. and C. 655); and we much doubt whether the execution of a power can be considered as within the jurisdiction and authority of that Court. What was known about powers when the Ecclesiastical Court first received its jurisdiction? Nothing is [50] more common than for the Court of Probate to pronounce for an imperfect paper, and thus give the litigant parties an opportunity of taking upon it the opinion of a Court of Construction. In what way is Mrs. Hughes damaged by this decree? The question as to the execution of the power by the testatrix must be tried either in the Ecclesiastical Court or in the Court of Chancery. We submit that it belongs to a Court of Equity; and the Prerogative Court has refused to call in the probate granted to Jones and Hayne of the will of 1829, till the Court of Chancery has decided whether that will had revoked the will of 1815 as to the execution of the power.

In the course of the argument observations to the following effect were made by the Court:—

Suppose that the Court of Chancery should receive this limited administration, and entertain the suit, and decide that the power executed under the will of 1815 was not revoked by the subsequent will, and that the party should afterwards go back to the Ecclesiastical Court and ask for a general administration; it would be competent for the Ecclesiastical Court then to say, "I do not agree with the Court of Chancery upon this point; I think that the execution of the power is revoked, and I will not give you a general grant." This might happen, for the Ecclesiastical Court does not in such a matter consider the decision of a Court of law, nor of a Court of Equity, as absolutely binding upon it: it only regards such a decision of a Court of Equity as the advice of a sensible man.

There are many cases where the best Court does not decide a question; as where questions of [51] blockade arise in insurance causes; there the Court of Admiralty would be the best Court to resort to; but the Court of common law, where such a question arises as an incidental point, must entertain it, referring to cases decided in the Court of Admiralty. So as to questions of foreign law, and other incidental points. It is not here a question whether the Court of Probate could best decide whether there has been a revocation of the execution of the power; but whether it is not bound to decide. That it might be inconvenient for the Ecclesiastical Court to entertain such a question, or that its decision upon such a question might conflict with the decision of a Court of Equity, will not enable the Ecclesiastical Court to throw upon a Court of Equity to determine which is the will of this testatrix; for that, at last, must be the point. The Ecclesiastical Court constantly considers questions of construction, as, for instance, in revocations. Where is the line of distinction to be drawn? What cases of construction are to be entertained by the Ecclesiastical Court, and what not? No case has been cited, and we know of no case in which the Court of Chancery, on a limited administration, with a paper annexed, like this, has ever decided that such paper was testamentary; and that the will of a later date was only a pro tanto revocation.

(a) 9 Ves. 369. See the observations of Eldon, C., pp. 371, 380-1.

The Court reversed the decree of the Prerogative Court as to the grant of limited administration; and retained the cause.

Mich. Term, By-Day.—On this day, before the Condelegates, the proctor for Sharon and William Turner prayed, pursuant to the original decree duly served and [52] returned into the Prerogative Court, probate of the several testamentary papers, as containing together the last will and testament of Mrs. Bonsall. This was opposed on behalf of Mrs. Hughes, who prayed to be heard on act on petition.

The Condelegates, after hearing Lushington in support of the motion, and Addams contrà, assigned to hear the matter before the whole commission.

11th January, 1832.—A proctor, on this day, gave an appearance for, and exhibited a proxy under the hands and seals of, Jones and Hayne, the executors of the will of 1829 and codicil thereto.

On the 3rd and 4th of February the cause was argued before the Judges Delegate, at Serjeant's Inn, and the following prayers were made by the respective proctors:—

The proctor for Sharon and William Turner prayed the Judges to revoke the probate of the testamentary papers of Mrs. Bonsall, dated on the 26th of October, 1829, and the 14th of June, 1830, granted to Jones and Hayne, and to decree probate of the testamentary papers dated respectively the 16th of December, 1815, 31st of March, 1818, 20th of March, 1819, 22nd of October, 1824, 26th of October, 1829, and 14th of June, 1830, as containing together the last will and testament of Mrs. Bonsall, to be granted to Jones and Hayne, the executors thereof; and to assign the proctor for Jones and Hayne to bring the probate, heretofore granted under seal of the Court below, into the registry of this Court.

[53] The proctor for Mrs. Hughes prayed the Judges to confirm the probate granted to Jones and Hayne, and to condemn the Turners in costs.

The proctor for Jones and Hayne prayed the Judges to confirm the probate already granted to them, or to decree probate of the several testamentary papers as containing together the deceased's last will, limited only to become parties to, and to attend, supply, substantiate, and confirm proceedings commenced or to be commenced in Chancery or any other Court of Equity, touching and concerning the execution (under the said testamentary papers, or either of them) of all powers of appointment possessed by the deceased, and remain parties to such proceedings until a final decree shall be given; and to condemn Sharon and William Turner in costs.

Sir Edward Sugden, Dr. Lushington, and Mr. Kindersley for S. and W. Turner. Mrs. Bonsall made several depositions of her property: the first will of which we hear was made on the 16th of December, 1815; this will is, in all respects, as technically prepared as possible; the power has been most fully and carefully executed: she recites her sister's will, and proceeds to dispose of what she had the power of disposing under that will: she revokes all former wills, and appoints Jones and Turner executors. Had there been no subsequent paper, no difficulty could have arisen; but in October, 1829, she executes another will, directly opposed in many of its bearings to the will of 1815; and upon this latter will the present question arises.

The will of 1829 was drawn by a solicitor, who [54] was ignorant that Mrs. Bonsall had any property over which she had a power of appointment.

It is a settled principle that if by a will you give property generally, however unlimited the terms you employ, yet property over which you have only a power of appointment will not pass. To make a will operate as an execution of a power there must be a reference either to the power or to the property held under the power. If a testator gives all his property to A., property over which the testator had a power of appointment by will would not pass under such a devise. Andrews v. Emmot (2 Bro. C. C. 297). In that case Lord Chancellor Thurlow says, "The question is whether the testator, in making that will, has executed the power against his wife whose property the fund was. It is necessary, in order to do this, that he should by his will notify his intention to do it. It is too late now to expect that a testator, in order to execute a power, shall make an express reference to it; because it has been determined that, if a man disposes of that over which he has a power in such a manner that it is impossible to impute to him any other intention but that of executing the power, the act done shall be an execution of the power." And further on he says, "Here the testator has made a will, by which it does not appear he recollected the settlement made upon the marriage, at least there is only one circumstance—the postponement of the residue till after the death of his wife—by which he appears to remember it." In Lovell v. Knight (3 Sim. 278) a married woman, having a power to appoint leaseholds and stock, by her will, executed as required by the power, but not referring to it, gave to her husband "the whole of her property, [55] both real and personal, and whatever she might possess at the time of her decease;" and it was held that the specific property would not pass under so general a bequest, and that the will was not a good execution of the power. In that case the report states that "the only property liable to be affected by the will consisted of the leasehold premises and funds comprised in the settlement, and of the sum of 112l. 18s. 9d. or thereabouts, which, at the time of Mrs. Lovell's decease, was in the hands of or due and owing to the trustees of the settlement, on account of the rents and dividends of the property comprised therein, but in trust nevertheless for the separate use of Mrs. Lovell." The decision in Lovell v. Knight has been since affirmed upon appeal. And "it is firmly settled that a mere general devise, unlimited in terms, will not comprehend the subject of the power unless it refers to the subject, or to the power itself, or generally to any power vested in the testator, or unless some part of the will would otherwise be inoperative" (see Sugden on Powers, p. 289, 5th ed.).

In Jones v. Tucker (2 Mer. 533) a poor woman, who had nothing of her own in the world, gave by her will 100l., and which sum of 100l. exactly tallied with the sum she had the disposal of under a power: she did not refer to the power; and the Master of the Rolls (Sir William Grant) did not allow it to operate as an execution of the power. There the precise sum was given, yet it was held to be no execution.

Another branch of the case is that, if the will of 1829 disposes specifically of a part of the property under the power, a general bequest of all the residue of the property will not carry the rest of the settled property. If, however, a testator disposes of all his real and personal estate, and [56] has no real estate except under the power, that estate will pass: but the personalty over which he has an appointing power will not pass. Personalty, indeed, such as stock, if specifically described, will pass, but not otherwise, unless the power be referred to. Wallop v. Lord Portsmouth (reported in Sugden on Powers, App. No. 11, 5th ed.). Standen v. Standen (2 Ves. jun. 589), affirmed in the House of Lords (Standen v. M'Nab, 6 Bro. P. C. by Tomlins, 193). Lewis v. Llewellyn (1 Turn. 104). Napier v. Napier (1 Sim. 28). The cases are collected in Doe dem. Roake v. Nowell (2 Bing. 497. 5 B. & C. 720), in which case the judgment of the Court of K. B., reversing the decision of the Court of C. P., was affirmed in the House of Lords.

Such being the general rule, how does it apply to the will of 1829? The drawer of that will, not being aware that the testatrix had the power, did not word the will in any other way than to pass an interest in property absolutely in her disposal, and not as an execution of the power. The words in that will, "held in trust for her," are no reference to the power: they are no more than the words "effects which I have or am interested in," which in Langham v. Nenny (3 Ves. 467) were held not sufficient. As to the greater part, this will of 1829 cannot, consistently with the authorities, operate as an execution of the power: and the Court cannot in this case find the intention except as it is expressed in the instrument: it cannot look at extrinsic facts, nor supply words to support it.(h)

[57] The will, then, of 1815 is a complete execution of the power; the paper

(h) In Andrews v. Emmot, 2 Bro. C. C. 303, Thurlow, C., says, "You must not go out of the instrument itself to gather the construction of it." See, however, Wigram "On the Admission of Extrinsic Evidence in the Interpretation of Wills," p. 49, note b.

subsequently executed, not being an execution of the power, cannot operate to defeat the former execution, and cannot therefore operate as an entire revocation of the will of 1815. The execution of the power by the will of 1815 put the legatees in the place of being appointed legatees under the first testatrix's (Martha Davies') will. Then, to defeat their interest under the will of the sister, Martha Davies, there should be some reference to that will; something to shew that Mrs. Bonsall had in view the property over which she had a power. The clause of revocation in the will of 1829 must be taken with the context to it. If the intention to execute the power is apparent on the will, then the power is sufficiently executed; and a general revocatory clause would be sufficient; but if in the will there is no reference to the power, nor to parts of the property under the power; as, in this case, there is no reference to the great mass of the personalty under the power, for the residuary clause is not such a reference as the law holds sufficient, in such a case a revocatory clause has no effect upon a prior will which is a due execution of the power. The revocatory clause must be taken in reference to the subject matter of the instrument.

But what may be collected to have been the testatrix's intention? The relations of the husband, who would come in for Martha Davies' property in the case of non-appointment, would come in under that lady's will, and not as the deceased's legal representatives, whom, by dying intestate as to any property, the deceased might be presumed to intend to benefit. Bonsall, the testatrix's husband, was not a favoured object of her bounty. [58] When he would have taken all unless she took it from him, she gave it to strangers: subsequently she bequeathed him a part, but after his death it was probable that she would prefer benefiting her own relations rather than his representatives. It would indeed, then, be singular if the Court were to make the bequests to the husband a vested interest in him, and thus pass to his representatives. Such, however, would be the result if effect were not given to the will of 1815.

As a question of intention, then, the case is wholly with us. Is there any rule of law which should prevent the Court from giving effect to that intention? So far from it, that to defeat the intention the rule of law as to revocation must be entirely reversed. The question of revocation is always to be gathered from, and turns upon, the question of the testatrix's intention; and that intention is to be gathered from the whole tenor of the instrument.

It is true that to the words of revocation must not be attributed any other or latent meaning than what such words express: the rule of law prevents a Court from looking at any other intention when the words are clear: but the whole instrument must be taken together; and in deciding whether general revocatory words operate to revoke a former appointment of certain property, the Court must bear in mind that the no less general dispositive words in the same instrument do not operate as an appointment of that property. Here, taking the whole instrument together, the conclusion is that the testatrix did not intend to revoke the former disposition, although, taking the exact words of the revocatory clause in the will of 1829 separately and detached from [59] the rest of the will, they would infer such an intention: and there is no rule of law but this—that it is the duty of Courts to give such a construction to the words of a will as the testatrix herself would put upon them.

Onions v. Tyrer (1 P. Wms. 345) governs this case: it decides that a general clause revoking all former wills is not imperative; but that it is to be considered in some measure and under some circumstances with reference to intention, if that intention can be collected from another instrument. Lord Chancellor Cowper there said: "A second will devising lands to the same person as the former, and revoking all former wills, and this subscribed by three witnesses, but not in the testator's presence, shall never revoke the former will so as to let in the heir; nay, if by the latter will the premises in question had been given to a third person, it should never have let in the heir, in regard that the meaning of the second will was to give to the second devisee what it had taken from the first, without any consideration had to the heir; and if the second devisee took nothing the first could have lost nothing." In that case the testator intended to exclude the heir; and therefore the revocation was held not to destroy the instrument and thus let in the heir. On the same principle, if the will of 1829 does not operate as an execution of the power, it does not revoke the former will, which was an execution of the power: for a will is not revoked by any subsequent act unless that act is operative for the purposes for which it was intended. Matthews v. Venables (2 Bing. 136). Eilbeck v. Wood (1 Russ. 564).

[60] In Powell v. Mouchett (Madd. and Geldart, 216) the Court of Chancery directed an issue whether a revocatory clause ought to operate as a revocation. Upon that issue it was found not to be a revocation. Why? Because it was contrary to the testator's intention. So the Prerogative Court, in Denny v. Barton and Rashleigh (2 Phill. 575), notwithstanding a clause of revocation, gave effect to a previous instrument.

That the deceased was a married woman, and that the question relates to the execution of a power of appointment, can make no distinction as to intention; a married woman having any power of appointment must be considered as sui juris, and consequently, as to intention, she must be considered as any other person who is sui juris. All these instruments, then, may have operation: and though this Court cannot decide on the beneficial interest of the parties under them, yet it will decide as to what instruments may be looked at: for the Court of Chancery has settled this rule, that an instrument cannot be received as a will unless it has been admitted to probate. But if the will of 1815 were admitted to probate, and this case should come on for decision either in the Court of Chancery or in a Court of law, neither of those Courts would be further guided by the decree of this Court than as to whether this latter will revoked or not the former will—that is, as to the testamentary nature of the instruments.

Mr. Campbell, Dr. Addams and Mr. Griffith Richards for Mrs. Hughes.(c) [61] There is a preliminary objection in this case. The Court, we submit, cannot enter into the question; for in the Prerogative Court Mr. Turner's original prayer was the same that it is here, viz.—that the probate of the will of 1829 might be revoked, and probate of all the testamentary papers granted. Mr. Turner acquiesced in the decree refusing that prayer, but now repeats the same prayer. His present application, therefore, is in effect an appeal from a sentence of the Prerogative Court, in which he had acquiesced.

Whether probate should be granted of these several papers, as together containing Mrs. Bonsall's last will, is a question of intention for a Court of Probate to decide upon a view of all the circumstances: such intention is not to be collected solely from the face of the instruments, but they may assist. Mrs. Hughes, however, has had no opportunity of shewing that the deceased did not intend her testamentary papers to operate collectively: they have not even yet been propounded in that form, and the Court is not, therefore, at present, in a condition to decree such a probate. If it should think that probate, as prayed by Turner, cannot be granted, then cadit quæstio; but if it is not of that opinion, then Mrs. Hughes should be allowed to go into evidence. Before the Condelegates it was submitted that the Court could not decide to grant probate of all the papers, as the case then stood; and the appellant prayed to be heard on petition on that point.

[62] Per Curiam. Did you inform the Court on what ground it was incompetent to entertain such an application?

Addams. No. It is not the usual course.

Per Curiam. It will require strong proof to satisfy the Court of the correctness of that position. Some ground surely must be stated before a party can be allowed, under such circumstances, to be heard on his petition; at least you can hardly be allowed now to go into evidence without paying the costs of this hearing.

Argument continued.

Upon the merits of the case. The question is whether the will of 1815 formed the will or part of the will of Mrs. Bonsall at her death. If probate of the will of 1815 be granted, there will be an end of the case in the Court of Chancery; for that instrument, of which probate is granted by the Ecclesiastical Court is, in a Court of Law or Equity, conclusively the will. Mrs. Hughes would then be excluded for ever; and would have no opportunity of urging her claim beyond this Court. The case, as regards the parties who would take under the original disposition and execution of the power, is not hard; it is not harder than if a power is improperly and imperfectly executed in any other manner—as by deed, when it ought to be done by will, and vice versâ. Mrs. Davies leaves the property in trust for the benefit of Mrs. Bon-[63]-sall, with a power in her to appoint to others: if then Mrs. Bonsall fails to appoint, or makes a defective appointment, the property necessarily goes as Mrs. Davies otherwise intended, viz. to Bonsall, the husband, and his representatives. If the instrument of 1815 is not Mrs. Bonsall's will, there is no power in the Court to give it probate. What reason exists for the Court to suppose that Mrs. Bonsall at her death ever thought of the will of 1815?

(c) Previously to the appellant's counsel commencing their argument a question arose whether, in this case, there would be a reply on the part of the respondents: when the Court decided that, as the case was now before it on the whole merits, and not—as in the Prerogative, and in this Court on the former argument—viz. on act on petition, a reply would be allowed.

The point for decision belongs wholly to a Court of Probate, and to be determined on its recognized principles. Even if the will of 1829 had not contained a direct revocatory clause it would equally have revoked the prior will. Swinburne (part 7, s. 14, pp. 974, 5, 7th ed.). If both papers are pronounced for, Turner, as an executor, must have probate as well as Jones and Hayne; yet the prayer porrected to-day by Turner (and it is the same as the original prayer in the Prerogative Court) is for probate to be granted only to Jones and Hayne.

The will of 1829 contains an express revocatory clause; and effect must be given to the language used. The original attempt to shew that the attorney had introduced such a clause without authority has been abandoned as not maintainable on the facts. Powell v. Mouchett only proves that the insertion of such a clause may be explained by evidence. If the revocatory clause is not to have effect, a mistake must clearly be shewn. Quod dixit non voluit is a dangerous argument. Suppose that the testatrix had said, "I revoke all other wills by me made and the will of 1815," what would have been the effect of such a revo-[64]-catory clause? Can it be doubted that the will of 1815 would be revoked. Had the testatrix thrown the will of 1815 into the fire, or otherwise cancelled it, would it not have been destroyed? And is not the clause of revocation equal to a cancellation? All the cases, cited on the other side, are merely as to real estate; in this case the landed estate compared with the personal is small.

Bayley, B. A will, simply in execution of a power, affecting realty, and not even appointing an executor, would be dealt with in Chancery without the interference of a Spiritual Court.

Argument continued.

Yes. But here a question arises as to the revocation of a will disposing both of realty and personalty by a later instrument; and the great bulk is personalty.

Bayley, B. Yet as to the Cardiganshire property a Court of Chancery could take this paper into consideration.

Argument continued.

This case is quite distinct from Eilbeck v. Wood (and that is the only case that applies); because here the will of 1829 performs all that is required of it: but in Eilbeck v. Wood the deed of 1811 was altogether void as an appointment, and the Court, therefore, could no more look at it than a parol declaration as to what the deceased meant.

Richardson and Lang v. Barry (3 Hagg. Ecc. Rep. 249) is a case of [65] some importance, and very similar to the present, and the arguments there urged are those used here to-day.

Alderson, J. In the case you have just cited the power was expressly referred to: and, as in this case, all former wills were expressly revoked. There might, however, be a case of only a partial revocation: suppose, for instance, the will had contained no revocatory clause, yet with an express devise of all the other property, except the gold watch, the Court would still have to consider what was to be done.

Argument continued.

It is quite as probable that the testatrix intended to benefit the persons whom she names in the will of 1829, as that she still intended the first appointment to stand; or she might mean to benefit her husband's relations; and unless it is quite manifest that she did not so mean, the Court must take the last will to express her intention; the testatrix describes it "as her last will and testament:" it is in no way limited, and the revocatory clause cannot otherwise be considered than that it was designed by the testatrix to have that effect which the plain sense of the words necessarily imports.

To allow Turner to take under the will of 1815 would be to defeat the deceased's intention. The bequests and legacies in the will of 1829 make it perfectly clear that her mind and intention, in executing that will, was to make a different disposition of her property from what she had done in 1815. The wills are utterly inconsistent. In the will of 1829 she gives directions for her funeral and monument; so also in the codicil of March, [66] 1818; but the two instruments are at total variance as to the fund out of which such expenses shall be paid. In the will of 1829 there are several new legacies; to Mrs. Scarborough she gives a gold watch that had belonged to Martha Davies. This she had before given to Mrs. Turner: what is to become of it if the will of 1815 stands? Who is to have it? In the will of 1829 the testatrix gives all her trinkets to Mrs. White, the same had been given to Mrs. Turner in the first will. Again she gives out of her own property a legacy of 3000l. to Mr. Gould; by her former will she had given him 4000l. out of her sister's property. Is Gould to have 7000l.? (a)[1] If the matter were left to conjecture the inference would be that it was the testatrix's intention that he should only take the lesser sum; that the last legacy was a substitution of the former.

Per Curiam. When, without any question arising as to the execution of a power, finished and unfinished papers are taken as together forming the will, bequests in the latter are in substitution for those of the former (see Ingram v. Strong, 2 Phill. 313).

Argument resumed.

The legacy only of 50l. to Turner, and the same to his son, without any mention of those other members of his family whom she had benefited by the will of 1815, shew that the deceased had altered her mind as to the extent of benefit to that family.

[67] Bayley, B. The legacy of 3000l. to Sharon Turner, "at his death to be equally divided between his family," under the codicil of June, 1830, shews a substitution.

Mr. Wilson for Mr. Jones. (a)[2] Mr. Jones, one of the executors in the will of 1829, has intervened in order that his interest may be protected. I submit first, the last will is a good execution of the power, and therefore that no limited probate of the will of 1815 ought to be granted: if, however, the Court should be of opinion that the last will is not a good execution of the power, then my prayer is for a probate of the several testamentary papers limited to substantiate proceedings in Chancery touching the execution, under any of the wills, of the power of appointment.

Bayley, B. Suppose the Court should be of opinion that the will of 1815 remains good as an appointment, and should grant probate of both papers, we should grant it distributivè to the respective executors, though the prayer stands as for probate collectivè to the two executors. Jones, Hayne and Turner are executors of the will of 1815: but whatever is done under the will of 1829 must be done exclusively by Jones and Hayne.

Argument resumed.

The cases cited to shew that general words cannot operate as an appointment of personal estate [68] do not establish the position so broadly as it has been laid down in argument. If some words of the will would be inoperative unless they were construed to apply to the power, then they are a due execution of the power. The words "or held in trust for me" in the residuary clause of the will of 1829 cannot apply to other property than that over which the testatrix had a power of appointment: the former part of the clause being sufficient to pass all other property. In Standen v. Standen the testatrix had a power over the produce of the real property, and over the personalty: and that she referred to real estate, having no real estate of her own, was considered a material circumstance as proving that she had in contemplation the power: and it was held that her will was not only an execution of the power over the real, but also over the personal, estate. That this was the decision appears from the registrar's book, and also from the decree in the House of Lords (Standen v. Macnab, 6 Bro. P. C. 202). It is quite sufficient if Mrs. Bonsall had in her contemplation, when she executed the will of 1829, the power of appointment which she possessed: and in that will she distinctly refers to some part of the property, viz.—to the gold watch, which she took under her sister's will. In Walker v. Mackie

(a)[1] Mrs. Gould, the wife, equally benefited as her husband under the will of 1815, was stated to be alive.

(a)[2] The counsel for the appellant objected to counsel for Mr. Jones being heard; but the Court decided that Mr. Wilson should be heard.

(4 Russ. 76) "all other her property" was held to mean the property under the power of appointment.

Here, the language of the will of 1829, as to the Cardigan estate, over which it is admitted she had a right of disposal only under the power, is a due execution of such power. Standen v. Standen is an authority in that respect.

[69] Sir Edward Sugden in reply. In Napier v. Napier I contended in like manner as Mr. Wilson has done in this case; that all that was wanted was something to lead to the conclusion that it was intended to exercise the power; but I limited my argument to the real property, and for this reason—because a devise of real property is always specific. Standen v. Standen was a case of a very peculiar nature: the real and personal estate were to be invested in the funds, and ultimately appropriated for the same purpose. In that case the Lord Chancellor said he could not distinguish between absolute property and a power over property; but by every successive Judge that argument has been deemed contrary to the rule of law: there is not even a dictum to uphold it.(a)[1] Walker v. Mackie, cited by Mr. Wilson, puts him out of Court; because there the testatrix, by expressly excepting out of the general bequest 50l. stock which formed a part of her trust property, told you, by that very exception, that she intended to include the other.

My client will derive no further advantage from the probate of 1815 than to enable counsel to argue upon it in the Court of Chancery: it will in no degree bind that Court in its construction. All that a Court of Equity wants, is to be told by this Court that it is a paper quà testamentary; and then it will be able to determine on its effect.

As to the inconsistencies between the first will and codicils and the latter, every hour of every day in the Court of Chancery is employed in deciding whether legacies are cumulative or substitutionary. There is nothing to shew that the [70] testatrix took the gold watch under her sister's will; it might have been a gift in her life-time. Here is, in this case, a power to give; an instrument sufficient to do it, but the evidence of the intention is wanting. My case is the converse of that of Eilbeck v. Wood; for there was intention and nothing else. Here there is every thing but intention.

Patteson, J. In Eilbeck v. Wood the Court held that the deed of settlement being void would not operate as a revocation of the will. Now here is an instrument which is not void, which is admitted to be valid and effectual for some purposes, may not such an instrument operate as a revocation of a will, notwithstanding it may be itself ineffective as an appointment?

Sir Edward Sugden. No intention to appoint is apparent in the will of 1829.

On the effect of a clause of revocation the case of Richardson v. Barry has been cited: that case was the simplest possible. The intention, both to revoke the former appointment and also to allow the property to pass as in default of appointment, was declared in the second paper; and, as it is quite clear that a will to effect a power is subject to all the incidents of a will, the instrument, though not attested to appoint, was sufficient to revoke.

Alderson, J. In Mouchett's case parol evidence was admitted as to the effect of an express clause of revocation: the like course might have been adopted here.

Sir Edward Sugden. Yes: and the Court of Chancery would allow evidence to be taken upon [71] that point. The revocatory clause in the will of 1829 must be confined to the subject matter to which the dispositive part of that will applies: that will is limited to her own absolute personal property; and does not and cannot affect the personal property over which she had a power. The clause of revocation in the will of 1829 must then be understood to apply to, and operate as a revocation of, a proper will, and not as a revocation of an appointment in the nature of a will.

The Court confirmed the probate of the will of 1829 and codicil thereto, as originally granted to Mr. Jones and Mr. Hayne, the executors.

It is understood that the ground of decision in the Court of Delegates was that the contents of the will of 1829, taken altogether,(a)[2] clearly shewed a departure

---

(a)[1] See the observations of Eldon, C., in Bradly v. Westcott, 13 Ves. 453.

(a)[2] In Bailey v. Lloyd, 5 Russ. 341, the Master of the Rolls, in speaking of the point whether a testator intended by his will to execute a power, says: "The question is a mere question of intention, and the intention is to be collected, not from a from the original intention in 1815, and therefore revoked that will: but that the clause of revocation, taken per se, and without a clear intention, would not have had that effect.

[72] SMYTH v. SMYTH. High Court of Delegates, 1831.—Under 55 G. III. c. 184, schedule pt. 1, and 5 G. IV. c. 41, schedule pt. 2, a protocol of appeal, being a notarial act, requires a 5s. stamp; and the Court of Arches having decided on that ground against the validity of an appeal from the Consistory, the defect is not cured by a stamp affixed previous to the hearing in the Court of Delegates on an appeal from that decision. A seal is unnecessary to the validity of a notarial act. Semble, that an inhibition does not remain in force so as to prevent the inferior Court from proceeding on the same, and also on additional facts in a subsequent suit, the original suit having been dismissed in the Court of Appeal by consent of parties.

[See further, p. 509, post.]

This was a suit of divorce, promoted originally in the Consistory Court of London, by the wife, for cruelty and adultery; the husband (on certain grounds not material to the points reported) appeared under protest. This protest came on for hearing on the 1st Session of Easter Term, 1831, when the Court took an objection, not raised in the protest, viz. that in a former suit, also for cruelty and adultery, between the same parties, it had been served with an inhibition, and on this ground directed the libel in the present suit to be brought in; and the question both as to the validity of the protest and the admissibility of the libel, as affected by the former proceedings, to stand over.

The libel was accordingly brought in; and on the 3d Session the wife's proctor prayed the Court to overrule the protest, and admit the libel, alleging that the former suit was agreed in the Arches, and in May, 1828, the husband dismissed by consent; and that no cause between the present parties was then pending either in the Arches or Delegates. The libel pleaded the former suit, and craved leave to refer, for the libel and proofs and for the proceedings therein in that former suit, to the records of the Consistory and Arches Courts. It then pleaded new facts.

Per Curiam (Dr. Lushington). The Court (after hearing Phillimore for the wife, and the husband in person) overruled the [73] protest, as containing nothing sufficient in law to support it; but refused to direct the husband to appear absolutely, or to admit the libel, holding that the inhibition was so far in force that the Court ought to defer to it.

From this decree the wife appealed. The inhibition was returned on the 15th of June. Mr. Smyth appeared under protest, chiefly alleging the insufficiency and irregularity of the proxy by which Mrs. Smyth had appointed her proctors. On the 1st of July the protest came on for hearing, when the instrument of appeal and the protocol of appeal were produced, and, for the first time, seen by the registrar: they were, however, not filed.

The Court of Arches overruled the protest, and assigned the husband to appear absolutely.

From this assignation the husband appealed; but on the 5th of July he prayed (without prejudice to his appeal) to be heard further in support of his protest, and alleged "that the appeal produced at the last session of the Court was not attested by a notary, nor was the protocol of appeal upon stamp, as required by law, and that it purported to have been interposed in one thousand eight hundred and thirty, the word 'one' being interlined in pencil."

These facts were admitted, on behalf of Mrs. Smyth, to be as stated: save that it was alleged "that it is not required by law that an appeal or protocol of appeal should be written on stamp; that the appeal was attested by two witnesses, and bears date 1831, and that both the appeal and protocol had been sent by the general post to the [74] notary public, before whom the protocol was interposed, for his attestation to the appeal."

---

particular expression, but from the whole will." See as to the execution of a power over realty, Hunloke v. Gell, 1 Russ. and Mylne, 515.

 The case of Hughes v. Turner is mentioned in a note in Sir George Lee's Cases, vol. ii. p. 542.

Mr. Smyth, in further support of his protest. An appeal has not been in due time and place interposed. The protocol, being a notarial act, requires a 5s. stamp, 55 Geo. III. c. 184, schedule part 1. And 5 Geo. IV. c. 41, which repeals certain duties on law proceedings, does not, among those that are repealed, specify a notarial act. The protocol therefore, not being duly stamped, is a nullity. The informality of the appeal itself is admitted.

Phillimore contrà. The protocol was duly interposed: it is signed by a notary public in the presence of two witnesses; and nothing further is necessary to give it effect. The ecclesiastical law only requires an appeal from a grievance to be in scriptis, it does not prescribe any particular form, Oughton, tit. 277. The 5th Geo. IV. c. 41 takes off stamp duties on certain judicial acts; and in the second part of the schedule this case is specifically provided for. Since that statute the practice, I conceive, has been not to use a stamp upon a protocol.

Per Curiam (Sir John Nicholl). Is not a protocol of appeal an extra-judicial act? Such an instrument is, I apprehend, nothing more than a notarial act. Besides, an appeal from a grievance is stricti juris; here is an informality in the date.

Phillimore. A protocol is to be extended into a more formal instrument; but it is the initiation and therefore an integral part of an appeal. The appeal [75] was drawn out immediately after the execution of the protocol, but the notary who attested it has since been absent from his office, and both instruments have now been forwarded to him by the general post for his attestation of the appeal.

Per Curiam. Have you then appealed so as to preclude objection? The statutes 55 Geo. III. c. 184, and 5 Geo. IV. say nothing even about appeals from a Diocesan Court. In the schedule of both statutes the words are these: "Appeal from any definitive sentence or final decree, or from any interlocutory decree, or order of the Court of Arches, or the Prerogative Court of Canterbury or York." If protocols have, in practice, not been lately drawn out on stamp, it may be because the defect is cured by an appeal properly extended; but if an appeal be not properly extended, then it is necessary to fall back on the protocol, and that is a notarial act, and requires a stamp.(a) I do not then think that the appeal has, in this case, been rightly and duly interposed.

The Court rescinded the order made on the last session, pronounced for Mr. Smyth's protest, dismissed him from the citation, and from all fur-[76]-ther observance of justice in the premises; and decreed the inhibition to be relaxed.

The wife appealed to the Delegates. The proctor for the wife brought in, at the hearing, the protocol of appeal, and also the appeal itself from the Consistory Court to the Arches Court, both on stamped paper, and both duly executed and signed by the notary and witnesses.

On the 23rd of May the cause was argued at the Delegates.

The Judges who sat under the commission were: Mr. Justice Gaselee, Mr. Baron Vaughan, Mr. Justice James Parke, Dr. Burnaby, Dr. Dodson, Dr. Curteis.

Mr. Smyth, in addition to his former objections in the Arches, contended that a notarial seal as well as subscription was essential; and consequently that the appeal to the Delegates, which, though signed, was not sealed either with a private or official seal, was a nullity.

Dr. Phillimore and Mr. Cockburn contrà. No seal is necessary: the notarial seal has long gone into disuse. The 55 Geo. III. c. 184, schedule part 1, which requires a 5s. stamp on a notarial act, "any whatsoever not otherwise charged in this schedule" relates solely to stamps on mercantile transactions. Even if a stamp were required for a protocol, the absence of it, at the time of execution, would not vitiate the instrument. The protocol (now, for the first time, brought into the registry) and (a) There never was any stamp required specifically on appeals from the diocesan and inferior Courts; and in practice the 5s. stamp as for a notarial act was always employed: while on appeals from the Arches or Prerogative Courts, a 15l. stamp being required, the stamp as for a notarial act was not used. When the 15l. stamp on such appeals was taken off, then the necessity for the notarial-act stamp was considered to revive; but, at all times, the 5s. stamp was, in practice, employed on the protocol, whenever such an instrument was drawn up, whether the appeal was from a diocesan and inferior Court, or from the Arches or Prerogative Courts. Appeals, apud acta, do not require a notarial-act stamp.

---

the appeal to the Arches are both stamped as notarial acts; the original defect, therefore, as to a stamp, if any [77] stamp be necessary for a protocol, is sufficiently cured. Burton v. Kirby (Taunt. 174), Roderick v. Hovill (3 Campb. 103), Wright v. Riley (Peake, 230, 3d ed.).

Cur. adv. vult.

June 5th.—The Court affirmed the decree of the Court of Arches.(d)

THE OFFICE OF THE JUDGE PROMOTED BY GREENWOOD AND SPEDDING v. GREAVES, CLAY, AND OTHERS. High Court of Delegates, June 28th, 1832.—Estimates for the repairs of a church and the lawful and necessary expenses of churchwardens, amounting to 111l., laid before a vestry, and a rate to that amount proposed, but a rate of 50l. 17s. only granted, whereupon two churchwardens exhibited articles against two other churchwardens and ten parishioners for refusing to make a sufficient rate. A decree, rejecting the articles, affirmed with costs. Semble, that the Ecclesiastical Court cannot decide on the quantum of a rate, and therefore that parishioners who do not contumaciously refuse to make a rate, but grant one not manifestly collusive, are not liable to be articled for refusing a sufficient rate.

On an appeal from the Chancery Court of York.

The Judges who sat under the commission were: Mr. Baron Bolland; Mr. Justice Bosanquet; Mr. Justice Taunton; Dr. Daubeny; Dr. Haggard, and Dr. Curteis.

This was originally a cause of citing James Greaves, James Clay [and ten others] (the respondents in the present suit), respectively parishioners and inhabitants of the parish of Dewsbury, in the county and diocese of York, "to answer to certain articles touching the health of their souls, and the lawful correction and reformation of their manners; and particularly for their refusing to make, or concur in making, a rate or assessment, or sufficient rate or assessment, for the repairs of the parish [78] church of the said parish, and for the lawful and necessary expenses of the churchwardens thereof, relating to the parish church, and incidental to their said office, promoted in the Chancery Court of York by Jonathan Greenwood and Thomas Spedding, two of the churchwardens."

The articles were as follows:—

1. "We article and object to you, James Greaves, James Clay [and ten others], that the parish of Dewsbury consists of the three townships of Dewsbury, Soothill, and Ossett, and that the inhabitants of each of the townships possessing, enjoying, or occupying messuages, lands, tenements, or dwelling-houses, within the same, were and are parishioners of the said parish, and as such have, from time immemorial, been liable to be, and have accordingly been, rated and assessed to the payment of one-third part of the expenses of the repair of the parish church of Dewsbury, and the lawful and necessary expenses of the churchwardens of the parish, relating to the parish church, and incidental to their office."

2. "That Greenwood and Spedding, together with James Greaves and James Clay, have been duly elected and appointed churchwardens of Dewsbury for 1830, and have been duly sworn, and taken upon them the execution of the office; and that, on or about the 16th day of August, 1830, a meeting of the parishioners and inhabitants of Dewsbury (consisting, as aforesaid, of these townships) was held in the vestry of the parish church, pursuant to due notice thereof previously given, for the purpose of taking into consideration certain estimates and statements of the charges for the ensuing year relative to the repair of the [79] parish church, and providing bread and wine for the holy communion, and other incidental expenses; and to make a rate, levy, or assessment for and towards defraying the said charges and expenses: that such vestry meeting was attended as well by divers of the inhabitants of the township of Dewsbury, and also by divers of the inhabitants of the townships of Soothill and Ossett, all of whom were parishioners of the said parish: that, amongst others, you, Greaves, Clay [and the other respondents], were present: that a statement or estimate of the said charges and expenses, amounting to the sum of 111l. 1s. or thereabouts, was then read and submitted to the consideration of the vestry meeting; and the rate or assessment proposed and required by the churchwardens, or some of them, to be made for the payment of one-third part of the amount thereof by each of the townships: that the charges and expenses were estimated moderately, and were lawful and necessary, notwithstanding which, you the said Greaves, &c. &c. and others of the parishioners, objected to, and did refuse to make or concur in making a rate, to the amount necessary to defray the charges and expenses; but, in lieu and stead thereof, proposed, consented, and agreed to make a rate of a part of the same to the amount altogether for the three townships of 50l. 17s. only: that the said sum of 50l. 17s. was and is wholly inadequate to pay for the necessary repair of the parish church, and the necessary expenses to be legally incurred by the said churchwardens relating thereto, and incidental to their office; and that by reason thereof the necessary and legal repairs cannot be done, nor other expenses necessary for the due performance of divine service be defrayed."

(d) By affirming the sentence, instead of dismissing the appeal, the Court of Delegates must, it is conceived, have held that the second appeal without a seal was valid.

The rest of the articles were formal.

[80] The Court at York having rejected the articles with costs, the cause was appealed to the Delegates.

The King's advocate, Dr. Phillimore, and Mr. Greenwood for the respondents. This proceeding is entirely novel, and does not present itself very favourably for a first experiment, as the two churchwardens, who are cited with ten other parishioners, have a concurrent authority and equal voice with the promoters. The second is the only important article; it pleads a vestry meeting for the purpose of considering certain estimates. None are annexed to the plea: if it were possible to uphold the articles, these estimates should be annexed. We do not impugn the doctrine that, where parishioners refuse to meet, or, meeting, decline to make a rate for necessary repairs and expenses, such parishioners may be proceeded against, and compelled. Watson's Clergyman's Law, c. 39, p. 388-9. Gibson's Codex, vol. 1, c. 4, p. 196. Degge, p. 203, ed. 1820. If parishioners contumaciously refuse or oppose a proper rate, a monition should in the first instance be served upon them. Thus in Lyndwood, in his chapter "Ecclesiarum reparationi debitè Archidiaconus invigilet" (lib. i. tit. 10, p. 53), in a note in verb. "subpœna," it is said, "Si aliqui, qui tenentur ad reparationem contribuere, et dum possunt, nolunt, vel nimis remissi sunt, tales, monitione præmissâ, potest ad hujusmodi contributionem compellere." Again, if Greaves and Clay, as churchwardens, had failed in their duty, they might have been proceeded against: but here a sum [81] is offered that should have been accepted and applied as far as it would go, and when exhausted another vestry should have been convened for a further rate. Here the parties have shewn nothing like contumacy or opposition to a church-rate; and yet they are cited in a criminal suit: if they had even acted contumaciously, the citation ought to have been preceded by a monition. It is, however, pleaded in this cause that other parishioners were present at the vestry besides the twelve upon whom a citation has been served: non constat that the respondents were not the minority. But even the majority did not refuse to make a rate; they thought the estimates too high, that there was no necessity for so large an assessment, and proposed to substitute a sum of 50l. 17s. The vestry is to judge of the quantum (Gibson, p. 196, s. 2. Degge, p. 203). Where is the offence for which these parishioners can be sued criminally? What punishment can attach—assuming that the Court should be of opinion that they had been guilty of an error in judgment in refusing the larger sum? Churchwardens alone cannot make a rate without first calling a vestry: and it is for the majority to say whether they acquiesce in the rate proposed, and what rate shall be assessed. Jeffrey's case (5 Rep. 66). Bacon Ab. tit. Churchwardens (C.), Prideaux, p. 48. The right to tax themselves is vested in the majority; yet for this exercise of their right, their privilege, and their franchise, they are cited criminally. In Blank v. Newcomb (12 Mod. 327) Holt, C. J., says the Ecclesiastical Court cannot assess a quantum: nor can it, we conceive, proceed against parishioners, collectively, for their vote as to such quantum.

[82] Mr. Hoggins for the appellants.(a) There is no necessity to use the word "contumacy," in order to raise the question involved in these proceedings. I assume that by the pleadings this question is raised, whether the defendants—the present respondents—contumaciously refuse to make a rate? I contend that they do. The authority of Degge, and the references given by that writer, and perhaps of the other text writers that have been quoted, rather make against me: I admit this; but I rely on the case of Rogers v. Davenant (1 Mod. 194, 236), where it is held by North, C. J., that the Spiritual Court may compel parishioners to repair their parish church; and by three other judges that "the churchwardens cannot, none but a parliament can, impose a tax." If therefore the churchwardens cannot of themselves and of their own authority proceed to make a rate for repairs, the question arises whether divine service is to be impeded by the refusal of the parishioners. We allege that the parishioners of Dewsbury will not make a sufficient rate; and my argument is, that they are properly sued under the present proceedings.

(a) Dr. Lushington, who was also of counsel for the appellants, was absent at the argument.

By the Court. There is no precise allegation that the church is out of repair. The case of Rogers v. Davenant is against you. The question here is as to two assessments—which sum shall be adopted. Estimates for repairs may easily vary. If the Court were to say that the higher estimate shall be adopted, it will then decide on the quantum of rate, and your own case, from 1st Modern, says that the Court cannot assess the parishioners. If it had been [83] alleged that the parishioners had contumaciously, obstinately, and pertinaciously refused to make a rate, or that they would only make such a rate as was manifestly collusive, there might be some ground for proceeding against them: but such a state of things is not alleged to exist in this case: there is no appearance of any wilful contumacy, either avowedly or impliedly.

Argument resumed.

In Bacon's Ab. tit. Churchwarden (C.), Burn's Eccl. Law, vol. 1, tit. Church, s. 6, and in Pierce v. Prouse (1 Salk. 166), it is laid down that parishioners ought to assess the rate for repairs, and not the churchwardens: so in Groves and Wright v. The Rector and Parishioners of Hornsey (1 Hagg. Con. 191) it is said, "According to the general rules of law, a churchwarden cannot make a rate himself." Thursfield v. Jones (1 Ventris, 367) is the only case in which it is held that the churchwardens alone can make a rate, after the parishioners have been summoned for that purpose, and refused. This authority stands alone; it is copied into Degge, Prideaux, and Anderdon, and with no other reference in support of the same doctrine. What churchwardens would, with these conflicting authorities, venture to make a rate of their own authority? They might subject themselves to be indicted. If churchwardens are liable to be sued and censured if repairs are not done, and yet have no power to make a rate against the will of the parishioners, what remedy remains but that resorted to in this case? The present course has been adopted in order to coerce the parishioners to do their duty.

The Court affirmed the decree, with costs.

[84] WATNEY v. LAMBERT AND SIMPSON. Arches Court, Mich. Term, By-Day, 1831.—1st. The plaintiff's allegation must not go beyond the citation: therefore where the citation is limited to shew cause why a rate should not be set aside by reason of its inequality, the party cannot plead the illegality of such rate in other respects.—2ndly. The Court has not jurisdiction, upon an original proceeding by an individual rate-payer, to set aside a rate on the ground of inequality in the assessment, the remedy for the party unequally assessed is to enter a caveat against the confirmation or to refuse payment of the rate.

On the admission of an allegation.

This was a suit, brought by letters of request from the Commissary of Surrey, citing the churchwardens of the parish of Beddington to bring into and leave in the registry a certain pretended church rate, and to shew cause why the same should not be set aside by reason of its inequality.

An allegation of thirteen articles, on behalf of Watney, a parishioner, and a party rated, was brought in. In the first four articles it was pleaded that on the 18th of March, 1830, the parishioners of Beddington, in vestry, resolved that the churchwardens should take and report the opinion of a surveyor as to repairs necessary for the church; that at a vestry of the 26th of August, the estimate being reported at 600l., it was resolved that the repairs should not be undertaken at such an expense, but that the opinion of another surveyor should be taken on certain other estimates. That in May, 1831, Lambert and Simpson (again being churchwardens), without order of vestry, had a part of the tower taken down and the bells sold. That the church rate objected to was, as pretended, made at a vestry on the 7th of July, 1831, when the principal rate payers were absent, and a motion of adjournment had been negatived:

that prior to the 7th of July a consi-[85]-derable expence had been unnecessarily incurred in taking down the tower, and that the rate was to defray that expense, and also as a reimbursement for expenses incurred by the churchwardens in 1831, and the two preceding years. The fifth article pleaded, "that the assessment was unequal, and without respect to the quantity of the possessions and rents of divers of the parishioners, and that Watney was unequally and unjustly assessed, and at a greater sum than by law he ought." The allegation then proceeded to set forth several instances (among others specifying Sir B. C. Carew and Mr. Tritton, but not the complainant) to shew that their relative assessments were very unequal; and concluded by praying that "the pretended church-rate might be quashed, or declared null and void by reason that the same was illegally made and assessed, and without respect to the quantity of the possessions and rents of divers of the parishioners and inhabitants, and that John Watney was unequally and unjustly assessed to the said rate, and to condemn the churchwardens in costs."

The King's advocate and Phillimore opposed the admission of this allegation. 1. The proper course has not been adopted: this mode of proceeding is without precedent. 2. The first four articles are irrelevant to this suit.

Per Curiam. Can the plaintiff's counsel state any instance of a proceeding of this kind?

Lushington and Dodson for Mr. Watney. We might have objected to the confirmation of [86] the rate, or, possibly, appeared under protest; but the present course seemed the most convenient and solemn. The Court, we apprehend, has complete jurisdiction; it can exercise a full right of supervision in respect to churchwardens, and we know of no reason why they should not be cited in a suit of this description. Extreme inconvenience and expense would ensue if the rate could not thus be stopped in limine. Here the rate is heavy; it is also a rate to reimburse, and therefore illegal: and Mr. Watney is one of the largest rate payers. If the inequality had been slight the case would not have been pressed. Should the Court be of opinion that the suit itself cannot be defended, it is unnecessary to discuss the merits of the allegation.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. This proceeding is quite of a novel description; nor has any attempt been made to shew an instance in which a similar course has been pursued: but it is argued that it is an expedient and convenient form of suit; and should now, for the first time, be adopted. If this be so, the Court must take especial care that it has jurisdiction to entertain the cause; and that if it has jurisdiction, the suit be confined strictly to the immediate object for which it has been brought.

The suit is brought by a rate payer to quash a rate altogether, by reason that he is unequally assessed, that is the only ground set forth in the decree. Has this Court any jurisdiction to give relief under an original proceeding of this nature? It has hitherto entertained suits of subtraction of church rate, the object of which suits is to enforce [87] payment. As matter of defence, the rate payer may shew that the rate was illegally made, or that he has been over-rated. Instances also have occurred, though they are very rare, where a party has been permitted to enter a caveat against the confirmation of a rate, and to shew that he has been over-rated; but the assessment, and valuation of the property to be assessed, rests, at least in the first instance, with the parishioners in vestry assembled, in like manner as the expenditure belongs to their decision: thus this Court can enforce the production of churchwardens' accounts, but it cannot examine them if they have been produced and allowed at vestry (Leman v. Goulty, 3 T. R. 3): and on the same grounds the Court would be cautious not unnecessarily to enter into the taxation and assessment, unless under precedents, and as essential to justice. All the arguments that I have heard to prove the convenience of the course, now for the first time pursued, would be equally satisfied by entering a caveat. If a rate payer is dissatisfied with his assessment, he should appear at a vestry and object to it; if his objections are in vain his remedy is twofold, first, by entering a caveat against the confirmation of the rate: for in that case he is in the nature of a defendant—the churchwardens are the parties applying for the confirmation—secondly, by refusing payment. In either case, if he can make out that he has been over assessed he will be relieved.

But can one individual rate payer, not appearing at vestry to object to a rate being made on the ground that it is for an illegal purpose, nor that the vestry has not been legally called, nor that the as-[88]-sessment has been unequally made, nor on any ground going to the invalidity of the whole rate, nor objecting that his own property is assessed above its true value, nor that, of the whole sum to be raised by the rate, he will have to pay more than his just proportion, can one individual rate payer thus lie by, and then come to this Court and pray that the whole rate may be quashed, because he offers to allege and shew that the value of the properties of a few individuals is greater in proportion to the assessments than the properties of other individuals? This Court would long hesitate before it determined to entertain such a suit. Any one individual in a parish could in this mode effectually prevent the vestry from making and collecting a rate: and as to the suit itself there might be as many issues as there are assessments.

It is unnecessary to enquire what might be gone into as matter of defence in a cause of subtraction of rate; but even in such a cause the party ought to be confined to shewing either that the rate was illegally made, or that his assessment was too high and beyond his just proportion of the whole rate. In that respect he might shew inequality. Here Mr. Watney, the ratepayer, is not the defendant, but the plaintiff; and it is to be considered both what his allegation does not, and what it does, contain.

It is not alleged that the vestry at which the rate was agreed upon and the assessment made was not duly called: it is not alleged that Mr. Watney attended and objected either to the rate altogether, or to his own assessment, or to that of other individuals. It is not alleged that at ninepence in the pound he is too highly rated. It is not even alleged that, taking the whole sum to [89] which this rate would amount, Mr. Watney's quota would, if the rate were equally made, be less than the sum at which he is now charged: possibly, however, upon his calculation of the value of the other property it might be so. On the other hand, what are the matters alleged? The first four articles are quite irrelevant to the present suit, as described in the citation, and the plaintiff cannot go beyond the citation. The citation or decree is expressly limited to the inequality of the rate. That is the only issue, and to that, in such a suit as the present, the party must be strictly confined. The first four articles refer to previous matters not bearing upon the question of inequality and are therefore inadmissible: they at all events must be rejected. The fifth article is merely general and introductory; and the remaining articles plead specific instances of inequality.

The thirteenth prays that the rate be quashed, by reason that it hath been illegally made and assessed, and is unequal, and that Watney has been unequally and unjustly assessed. The prayer then goes to both points—the illegality of the rate arising from the facts pleaded in the first four articles, and the inequality; and it will lead to an investigation of the positive value, and of the relative value of some of the principal assessments in the parish: it only states generally that the plaintiff is over assessed, not specifying in what manner, or in comparison with any particular individuals; and the whole argument in favour of this novel mode of proceeding is, that it is convenient; but it is not so convenient nor so speedy as a caveat.

Upon the whole, as there is no precedent of [90] such a suit, I think the Court has no jurisdiction to entertain it. The assessment of the several properties rateable belongs peculiarly to the parties themselves in vestry; and if every rate could be set aside because any dissatisfied individual undertook to shew some inequality in the assessment, no rate could ever be made, and the parish might be perpetually involved in litigation. The protection which the law gives to the individual is to allow him, as a matter of defence, either to shew that the rate is altogether illegal, or that he is overcharged. This Court has hitherto confined itself to suits of subtraction of rate, or to confirmations of rates when caveats have been entered against them: but even in respect to the confirmation of rates, the very words in which the ordinary confirms them shew some doubt how far it has authority to interpose in respect to the amount taxed as the assessment—"We confirm as far as by law we may:" but it has been held that the rate is valid without such confirmation.(a) I reject the allegation and dismiss the churchwardens.(b)

Allegation rejected.

(a) Knight and Littlejohns v. Gloyne, 3 Add. 53.
(b) See Greenwood and Spedding v. Greaves, supra, 77.

[91] LAMBERT AND SIMPSON v. WEALL. Arches Court, Hilary Term, By-Day, 1832.—Objections to church-rates, on the ground of inequality tending to occasion great inconvenience and expense to parishes, are stricti juris, and the pleas must be confined to the points originally put in issue. A rate-payer, in his defensive allegation objecting to his assessment on the sole ground of being overrated as compared with two others, shall not, in additional articles, introduce, as a fresh objection, that a railway passing through the parish has not been assessed. Quære, if the question, whether such railway was liable to be rated to church-rate, could have been originally raised as a collateral, incidental point by a party objecting to payment of his own rate on the ground of being overrated.—The Court pronounced for a church-rate and condemned in costs a rate-payer, who, as overseer of the poor, had collected rates, and had long acquiesced in the payment of church-rates made on the same valuation as the church-rate objected to on the ground of inequality, such inequality not being established in evidence. —The presumption of law is that a church-rate made at a vestry duly holden, and the same as in former years, is fairly assessed, and the burden of proof is in the party objecting to payment on the score of inequality; and the presumption and burthen are both increased when the rate is founded on a valuation long acted upon both for church and poor-rate.

This was a cause of subtraction of church-rate, promoted (by letters of request from the Commissary of Surrey) by the churchwardens of Beddington parish (the defendants in the preceding suit) against Thomas Weall, Esq., a parishioner and inhabitant of the hamlet of Wallington, within the said parish. The sum at which Mr. Weall was assessed in the rate amounted to 48l. 16s. 6d.

The libel consisted of eight articles; and, first, pleaded a rate (duly made on the 7th of July, 1831) of 1s. 6d. in the pound, towards the necessary repairs of the parish church of Beddington, and the churchwardens' expenses incidental to their office.

2. That Weall was duly, rightly, and legally assessed for his lands and houses in Beddington and in the hamlet of Wallington within Beddington. The article specified the property and the proportions of rate, and (inter alia) that for a house and four and a half acres, valued at 100l. per annum at the least; twenty-two acres of meadow at 29l. 6s. 8d. per annum; and a house and garden at 4l. per annum (all in Wallington), collectively his assessment in the rate was 10l.

3. Exhibited the rate, and pleaded it to have been subscribed by the churchwardens, overseers, and some of the most considerable parishioners; that it had been confirmed, and generally paid.

4. That Lambert and Simpson were and are churchwardens, and that, as such, Weall's assessment is due to them.

[92] No witnesses were examined on the libel, as the rate was admitted to have been made as pleaded.

On the 25th of February, the by-day after Hilary Term, an allegation was admitted on behalf of Weall, which pleaded, generally,

1. That the rate was not equally and fairly assessed: that Weall was assessed according to a much higher scale of valuation than several other parishioners.

2. That Sir B. H. Carew's house, garden, and appurtenances were of the value of 200l. per annum: and so assessed for King's taxes, and in the judgment of competent persons are well worth such rent; but that he was rated at 100l. only.

3. That Mr. Tritton's house, garden, and appurtenances were of the yearly value of 80l. and paid King's taxes at that sum, but that he was only rated at 47l. 2s.

4. That in comparison with the assessment of Sir B. Carew and Mr. Tritton, Weall is greatly overrated for his house and four and a half acres in Wallington; which are not rated to the King's taxes at a value exceeding 100l. per annum.

On the 2d, 3d, and 4th articles of this allegation four witnesses were examined.

On the second session of Easter Term, the 24th of April, an additional article to Weall's allegation was opposed and debated.

The article pleaded that "the Croydon and Merstham iron rail-way traversed Beddington parish and hamlet; that the proprietors of the land, or of the tolls collected thereon (of the value of about 40l. per annum) were liable to be assessed in respect thereof for church-rate; [93] that part of the rail road going through Mitcham parish was so assessed, but that in the rate sued for the proprietors aforesaid were omitted."

The King's advocate and Phillimore for the churchwardens.

Lushington and Dodson for Mr. Weall.

Per Curiam [after stating the dates and substance of the pleas]. The question then is, whether this additional article is now admissible. Great facilities ought certainly to be extended towards the recovery of a church-rate, since much inconvenience arises to a parish if its rates are opposed in a litigious spirit by individual parishioners.(a)[1] This allegation, or additional article, raises a question of very considerable importance, viz.—whether this rail-way passing through the parish is liable to be assessed to the church-rates, and if it be so liable, then again, on what principle, and in what proportion?(b)[1] The Court would not allow such a [94] question to be raised unnecessarily, nor merely as a collateral question—not between the parish and the owners of the rail-way—but, incidentally, by a person refusing to pay his own rate on the ground of inequality.(a)[2] Such inequality is a fair ground of resistance; but this additional article opens quite a different line of defence. I should have entertained considerable doubts as to the propriety of admitting this article, even if it had been originally set up in the defensive plea: for it is not suggested that this objection was taken at the vestry when the rate was made, nor that it was then brought to the consideration of the parish: it would seem, therefore, to be rather an after-thought, tending to protract the suit and harass the parish.

Another material question arises, whether this plea has not been offered too late. It is a well-established rule that a party cannot make his defence bit by bit, but must plead all his facts at once,(b)[2] especially in so simple a suit; and the fact now offered cannot but have been within the party's knowledge when the defensive allegation was admitted, and if that be the case, the rule is, [95] that he is not at liberty to introduce it subsequently. This objection is doubly strong on account of the particular time at which this article has been brought in. The allegation was admitted in the last term; by the order of Court the term probatory expired on the first session of this term, and on that day the defendant's proctor, instead of praying publication, his witnesses having been examined, tenders this additional article: no affidavit is offered in support of it, nor is any special ground stated why this Court should depart from its regular practice. I reject the article, and decree publication, unless an allegation is asserted on the other side.

Additional article rejected.

A responsive allegation pleaded—

1. That the rate was not unequal: that the assessment was made by a committee appointed by vestry on the 21st of December, 1830, for the valuation of Wallington: that Weall attended the valuation of his house and land in Wallington, when the committee separately valued his house and four and a half acres, and the twenty-two

---

(a)[1] So, as to poor-rates, the 41 Geo. III. c. 23, after reciting "that the quashing or setting aside of rates for the relief of the poor is attended with great inconvenience," gives a power to the Quarter Sessions to amend without quashing; and enacts that notice of appeal shall not prevent the recovery of the rate; and that notices of appeal shall specify the particular cause and ground of appeal; and, at the hearing, that the Court shall not examine into any other cause or ground of appeal but such as are so specified. See ss. 2, 3, 4.

(b)[1] That the proprietors of canals are rateable to the poor-rate of every parish through which the canal passes, as the occupiers of land covered with water, for their tolls as profits arising out of the land there situate; and that they are rateable in each parish for the amount of tonnage dues actually earned there, and not for a part of the whole amount earned along the whole line of the canal in proportion to the length of the canal in that parish; and on the net profits—not for the gross amount of tolls received. See Rex v. Nicholson, 12 East, 330. Rex v. Trent and Mersey Navigation, 1 B. and C. 545. Rex v. Palmer, 1 B. and C. 546. Rex v. Portman, 1 B. and C. 551. Rex v. Inhabitants of Kingswinford, 7 B. and C. 236. Rex v. Oxford Canal Company, 10 B. and C. 163. The same principle, it is apprehended, applies to railways.

(a)[2] Upon the construction of 41 Geo. III. c. 23, it has been held that the justices cannot hear an appeal against a rate on the ground that a party has been omitted who ought to be rated, unless it be proved that notice of appeal has been served on that party. Rex v. Brooke, 9 B. and C. 915.

(b)[2] So in pleading in matrimonial suits. Story v. Story, 3 Hagg. Ecc. Rep. 739.

acres of meadow land (the assessment for which jointly was 129l. 6s. 8d.) and rated the former at 100l.

2. That Carew's house, &c., was in such a state that persons qualified would not estimate it at more than 100l. in comparison with sums assessed on other property in the parish.

3. That Tritton's house, &c., at 47l. 2s. was fully valued in comparison, &c.

4. That Weall's house and four and a half acres were of greater value than 100l. —house in all respects superior to Carew's.

[96] 5. That the Beddington church-rates were never regulated by the King's taxes; but were taken from the poor-rates, at about two-thirds of the supposed actual value of the property. That Weall was overseer for ten years; always rated Carew at 100l. and Tritton at 47l. 2s. to poor-rates: also assessed Hansler at 99*l. which is of less value than his own, but has more accommodation than Carew's.*

6. That before the rate was made the churchwardens proposed at vestry that Beddington district should be re-valued; that Weall, who occupies 800 acres in Beddington, opposed the revaluation, and it was abandoned.

7. That formerly the churchwardens assessed houses and other property held by the same person in one sum; that the present churchwardens specified separately each sort of property; that Carew and Tritton were so separately assessed to the poor-rates by Weall; and are now assessed in the same gross amount, taken together, as in the rate of 1830, signed by Weall.

This allegation was debated, and the parts now printed in italics were struck out as inadmissible.

Per Curiam. The Court is particularly desirous that these suits should be short, and the pleas strictly confined to the issue. The defence set up is the inequality of the rate, and that Weall, the defendant, is rated higher in proportion than others. In support of this averment the party has referred to certain assessments for the King's taxes, and has specified two individuals—Sir B. Carew and [97] Mr. Tritton—as being under-rated in comparison with himself. It was argued that the attempt to mix up poor-rates and church-rates was not tenable, inasmuch as they were subject to different considerations and formed no proper analogy the one to the other. To this it was well replied that a poor-rate, when equally assessed over all the parish, is a better criterion than the King's taxes: and I think, in this case, that the acquiescence of the parish for some years in this mode of assessment to the church-rate is primâ facie evidence of its propriety: (a) the first part of the fifth article may therefore stand; but the latter part introduces a new comparison—a new issue; and, if admitted, will not prove that Carew and Tritton are not rated too low in comparison with Weall; which is the sole issue in this suit. I therefore reject the latter part of the fifth article.

So, again, how will the sixth article prove that Carew and Tritton are not under-rated, and consequently Weall overrated, and the rate unequal? This then must be struck out. The seventh also is unnecessary; for the conduct of the defendant, while overseer of Beddington parish as set forth in the fifth article, furnishes a sufficiently strong inference that Carew and Tritton were fairly assessed to the poor-rate at the sums which have been since adopted as a proper valuation in the assessment of a church-rate.

The allegation was reformed, and admitted.

Upon this allegation four witnesses were examined.

Weall's answers were also given in: the first, after admitting the appointment in 1830 of a com-[98]-mittee, of which he was a member, for the valuation of Wallington with a view to assess that hamlet to a poor-rate, proceeded—"That the church-rate in question was unduly and unjustly founded upon such scale of assessment, for that Wallington having always maintained its own poor, such scale of assessment was made by the committee solely for the purpose of assessing that hamlet only for poor-rates, and had no reference whatever to the comparative value of the rateable property in other parts of the parish, and that the rate of valuation of the property within the hamlet was made upon a much higher scale than the general scale of valuation for the poor-rate in the rest of the parish: that the houses and premises occupied by Carew and Tritton are not in Wallington." The answer admitted the mode and amount of valuation of the respondent's house and four acres and a half, but set forth "that by a subsequent committee duly appointed, for that purpose, by a vestry of Wallington hamlet, a fresh valuation was made on the 19th of April, 1832, of the rateable property within the hamlet, for the aforesaid purpose, in which valuation the respondent's said house and land were rated at 80l., the same together with several other houses in the hamlet in like manner being reduced, having been considered by the committee as much higher rated than similar houses in Beddington parish not within the hamlet."

(a) See Thompson and Sandford v. Cooper (cited in Lee and Parker v. Chalcraft), 3 Phill. 641, in notis.

The 2nd, 3rd, and 4th articles were not objected to. The 5th admitted "that the assessments to the church-rates were and are taken from the parochial poor-rate books, but denied that the church-rate was just and equal, inasmuch as the whole parish of Beddington was not impartially assessed to the poor: it also denied that the rate of assess-[99]-ment throughout the parish was at about two-thirds; for that the estimate of the value of house property in Wallington, to the poor-rate, was made on a much higher scale of valuation than some house property for the like purpose in the rest of Beddington parish." The respondent admitted "that, as overseer, he had, as alleged, assessed Carew, his predecessor, and Tritton:" but he said, "that he and his colleague did not assess them justly and equally with the other parishioners, but followed the same rate of assessment as made upon the said persons by their predecessors in office; and that this was done in consequence of the numerous acts of charity towards the poor exercised by the said persons, and with a full knowledge that the said assessment was not equal, and that he and his colleague so acted with a view to the advantage of that part of the parish."

Trinity Term, 2nd Session.—The parts of the answers now printed in italics were objected to as irrelevant and redundant.(a)

The admissibility of an allegation, offered on the part of the defendant, was debated at the same time. The principal articles of this allegation pleaded what the defendant had set forth in his answers: viz. that the assessment made in 1830 was for Wallington only (which maintained its own poor), and was made at a higher scale than the rest of the parish, which was not included in the said assessment, and that the assessments on Carew's and Tritton's houses to the poor were always considered by Weall as inadequate, but were not altered on account of the benevolence of their owners.

Per Curiam. The observation is well founded that there has [100] been no unnecessary delay, provided the plea now offered is relevant. But where are the pleas to end? If every frivolous little matter is allowed to be counterpleaded the pleas may run on ad infinitum. The sole object here is to obtain payment of a church-rate; that is opposed on the ground of inequality; and the defendant has selected two persons who are underrated as compared with his assessment: two instances for this purpose are as good as two hundred; and the real gist of the case depends on the true valuation of these three houses, and that must be proved by the valuation of competent persons. Whatever other matter is introduced can hardly be of importance, except for the purpose of assisting the judgment of the Court if the conflicting evidence of competent witnesses should be very nicely balanced.

Some collateral matters have crept into the cause which perhaps in strictness might have been excluded. On the one side, the defendant pleaded the scale of assessment to the King's taxes; on the other side, the churchwardens—what was the assessment to the poor-rates; the one led to the other; but each has only a distant and inferential bearing, and might with advantage have been left to be extracted by interrogatory.

Primâ facie the poor-rate seems to furnish a fair ground of analogy; it is generally much higher than a church-rate, and therefore the assessment is laid with greater accuracy: but if the poor-rate is not fairly laid over the whole parish it ceases to be a just criterion.

It is said that the valuation of 1830 did not extend to Beddington proper; and a new principle of inequality is thus introduced; for if, as is now alleged, Wallington be assessed in a higher scale than the rest of the parish, the whole of Bedding-[101]-ton proper is underrated to the church-rate, or, which is the same thing, the whole of Wallington is overrated: this would be a ground for a re-assessment of the whole parish in order to make an equal church-rate. But the issue in the present case is confined within narrower limits, viz. to a comparison of the assessment of Weall on the one hand with Carew and Tritton on the other. True it is that the assessment to, and valuation for, the poor-rate would not, if these averments be true, furnish a fair rule, and it was therefore necessary that the circumstances should be explained either in the answers or by plea; but even if the poor-rate had been properly laid over the whole parish generally, it would not have been so just a criterion as a regular valuation, because there may be reasons of expediency and policy to prevent the rigid enforcement of a poor-rate at its full value against particular individuals, lest it might lead to a curtailment of their liberality to the poor.

(a) These parts were ultimately struck out, v. infra, p. 101.

My view of the matter, then, is to allow the explanation in the answers to stand, except as to the valuation in 1832 which is thrown in at the end of the first answer; but the preceding part of the explanation has been properly brought to the notice of the Court, and renders any pleading upon the matter unnecessary. The rest of the allegation, however, is quite immaterial: the fourth article states the opinion of the defendant Weall: this also is set forth at the close of the fifth article of the answers, and has been properly objected to. The Court having before it the fact of the assessments, of what advantage in forming its judgment can be the opinion of Mr. Weall? By rejecting the allegation, and directing the end of the first and fifth articles of the answers to be struck out, [102] the Court will bring the case within its proper bounds.

On this day the cause was argued upon the effect of the evidence on the respective pleas.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. This is a suit of subtraction of church-rate brought by the churchwardens of Beddington against a parishioner. No question arises on the regularity of the rate, nor on the liability of the defendant to be assessed, nor is it alleged that he is overrated except relatively. The sole ground of defence is that the rate is unequal; and the ground of inequality is stated to be, that two other parishioners, Sir Benjamin Pole Carew and Mr. Tritton, are, each for his house and garden, rated relatively and proportionally lower than the defendant for his house and four acres and a half of land. The defendant is assessed for various other lands, but those assessments are not objected to: whether or no they are paid I am not informed; but I suppose that they are not, because he maintains that the whole rate is invalid. Both Carew and Tritton are also separately assessed for lands, besides their assessments for house and garden. Then the only inequality alleged is between the assessments of these three individuals with regard to their respective houses and gardens.

The fact is not denied that the church-rate is made on the same assessment as the poor-rate, and agrees with it in all particulars; nor is it denied that all the three parties, Carew, Tritton, and Weall, have been rated for several years past at the same amount as in the present rate, nor that [103] Weall himself, as a member of the parochial committee of valuation in 1830, as overseer and ratepayer, has for several years acquiesced in, and acted upon, the assessment of which he now complains. In suits where the rate is objected to on the ground of inequality, and especially under the circumstances of this case, the burthen of proof lies upon the rate-payer who resists: he must prove, and satisfactorily prove, the inequality: if the matter be left doubtful he fails in his defence. Where the rate is regularly made in open vestry, where it is the same as in former years, and there is no suggestion of any fraud or oppression in the mode of assessment, the presumption is strongly in favour of the assessment, and the refusal of payment is not to be encouraged.

The resistance produces great inconvenience to the parish; it increases the burthen of the rates; it excites disputes and animosity, and therefore should not be made upon slight grounds.

The question, then, is whether Mr. Weall has established by evidence the inequality of the assessment. Weall is, as I have stated, rated at 100l. a year for his house and four and a half acres of land; Sir Benjamin Carew at the same for his house and garden; and Mr. Tritton at 47l. 10s. for his house and garden. The general scale of rating, both for poor-rates and for church-rates, is the same throughout the whole parish—as well for Beddington proper, as for the hamlet of Wallington—two-thirds of the full value. That scale of course is not adopted as to the King's taxes; but that the assessments both for poor and church-rate should be on the same principle seems natural.

It is not alleged that Weall is overrated, except as compared with two other parishioners: but his defence is, that if he is properly rated at 100l. a year, [104] Carew ought to be rated at as much more, and Tritton at more than half of Weall's assessment. In support of this inequality Weall has examined four witnesses—Blake, an auctioneer of Croydon; Foakes, a surveyor and agent; Ray, a carpenter; and Michael, a baker and overseer at Carshalton. They certainly give an opinion not exactly agreeing as to amount, but they do concur in saying that Carew's premises are much more valuable than those of Weall; and that Tritton also is relatively underrated: this, at most, is only matter of opinion, and of opinion formed rather loosely and without adequate grounds. Weall goes to Mr. Blake one evening and gets Foakes to meet him there; he asks them what they think of the relative value of his premises and those of the other two; they answer without hesitation that Carew's are of much greater value—of double; and that Tritton's are nearly as much as Weall's. In his examination in chief Blake says, "My belief is that Sir Benjamin's property, which is called Beddington Park, is worth nearly as much again as Mr. Weall's;" and in respect of Mr. Tritton's he says, "I do not hesitate to depose that if Mr. Weall's house and lands are assessed as of the value of 100l., Mr. Tritton's ought at least to be assessed as of the value of 75l. or 80l." Foakes says, "The annual value of Beddington Park would be moderately stated at from 180l. to 200l. per annum;" "and Mr. Tritton's residence I should state at 100l. to 120l. per annum."

These witnesses were not employed carefully and accurately to survey and estimate the several premises; they give their evidence without having seen them for a considerable time, and are principally acquainted with them by seeing them in riding by. Before their production as witnesses to disprove the fairness of the assessment of the [105] vestry and parish officers for years past, they should have regularly surveyed the respective premises.

Loose evidence, however, of this description would scarcely be sufficient to invalidate the rate, if the case rested here. But it is opposed by testimony much of the same sort and of about equal weight, viz. of witnesses giving a contrary opinion and stating in their judgment the fairness and equality of the rate. These witnesses are, Mr. Loraine, a barrister, who is well acquainted with the whole of the parish and resides in Wallington hamlet: this gentleman was overseer for five years, has therefore had a good opportunity of forming a correct judgment; is himself a large rate-payer, and has throughout this business acted a very proper and impartial part. There is also Mr. Streeter, an auctioneer; Fludder, a master carpenter; and Robert Blake, a bricklayer. These concur in opinion that the rate is fair and equal, and quite balance the testimony of Weall's witnesses. Streeter, on the third and fourth articles, deposes in this manner: "If Mr. Tritton's house were rated at about half the value of Sir B. Carew's, I should say it was fairly rated; and Mr. Weall's house I should myself rate rather higher, if any thing, than Sir Benjamin's. Mr. Weall's house with the garden and pleasure ground belonging to it, taking them at four acres, is fairly worth 150l. per annum; that is a very low rent for it."

The Court cannot venture to form any estimate as to the comparative value of these different houses from a description of them; but I can easily conceive that Sir Benjamin Carew's, with a centre and two wings, standing at the edge of an old park, may excite from its external appearance an opinion of high value, which on an accurate investigation would prove to be incorrect. The centre is [106] described to consist of a hall open to the roof; and of the two wings, one has been gutted by fire, and is useless except for lumber: this would be a forlorn residence to any person but the owner of the park. Even the extent of the pleasure grounds would, by occasioning additional expense to a tenant, be a drawback from the amount of rent. I am not then surprised that witnesses should think that Weall's house would probably let for as much as, and would find many more takers than, this old mansion, notwithstanding the grandeur of its external appearance. But the value upon which a house is to be assessed is that for which it would let, not at what a proprietor, who from family feelings would choose to submit to inconveniences rather than abandon the old mansion, would value it.

It is difficult to conjecture what has induced the resistance to this rate. There seems no just ground to suppose that the property in Beddington is rated on a lower scale than in the hamlet of Wallington. Mr. Loraine on the tenth interrogatory thus deposes: "The committee, in making their scale of assessment for the hamlet of Wallington, acted upon the same principle upon which Mr. Bainbridge in 1806 valued the whole of the rateable property in the parish, both in Beddington and Wallington, viz. that of putting a moderate value upon all property and assessing upon two-thirds of that value. The assessment to the poor-rate upon the inhabitants of the other parts of the parish without the limits of Wallington is not made from a distinct scale of assessment; the scale is the same as that of Wallington, although they have not had a revaluation: the assessment, whereby the Beddington district is assessed to the poor-rate, is not made upon a lower rate than that [107] of Wallington; it was proposed at the time Wallington was revalued that Beddington should be too; but the defendant Weall said, 'No, they did very well in Beddington,' and so little difference did we find in the revaluation of Wallington from the valuation of that hamlet in 1806 that in a gross amount of about 3000l. the difference was under 20l." Again, on the twentieth interrogatory: "The parish is very liberal, we can do any thing in the parish for the poor among the gentlemen; and that makes the present dispute about the church-rate the more unfortunate; if it were not for the private charities in the parish the poor's rates would be half as much again as they are."

I agree with the witness that this is an unfortunate resistance, and not only so, but I think that it is a vexatious resistance, and one which the party must be held to have undertaken at his own peril. The Court is of opinion that the inequality of the rate is not sufficiently proved: and I pronounce for the rate sued for, and condemn the defendant in costs.

HOWARD v. WILSON. Arches Court, 2nd July, 1832.—In a suit of subtraction of legacy a coachman, a married man, originally hired by, and who had lived five years with, the testatrix, residing over her stables in town, occasionally accompanying her into the country where he lived in the house, though, like all her servants, on board wages; waiting sometimes at table, and remaining with her though she changed her job-man, held (although the several job-masters paid him his wages and board wages—except 3s. per week extra in the country—and found him in liveries) entitled under a bequest "to each of my servants living with me at the time of my death 10l.," and the executrix condemned in full costs.

This was a suit of subtraction of legacy, brought by Thomas Howard against Elizabeth Wilson, the acting executrix under the will of Isabella Chandless, late of Dorset Square, widow, who died on the 17th of May, 1829.

The libel, after pleading that the testatrix by [108] her will gave as follows:—"To each of my servants living with me at the time of my death ten pounds," alleged in the fourth article "that at the testatrix's death, and during nearly four years and ten months previously thereto, T. Howard was in the service of, and living with, her as coachman."

On behalf of Mrs. Wilson it was pleaded "that Howard was a job-coachman in the service of Hill, and by virtue of an agreement between the deceased and Hill, a job-master, dated the 1st of May, 1828, drove the deceased; that Hill paid, to the deceased's death, the coachman's wages and board wages, and provided him with a box-coat and other necessary articles." The agreement was exhibited: it stated that "Hill agreed to let and Mrs. Chandless to hire of him, for the term of one year from the date thereof, a pair of carriage horses, at 200l. per annum; including harness, coachman, and livery; and, if out of town, Mrs. Chandless was to pay three shillings per night extra."

On this allegation Hill deposed: "My agreement was to furnish Mrs. Chandless with a pair of horses and harness: I did not find her a coachman, although I engaged to pay him twenty-six shillings per week. I made no contract to find him a livery; I never did find him with livery or box-coat."

On interrogatory: "I found Howard in her service, and he continued so. He never drove for me; and I never returned him to the collector of King's taxes as my servant. I considered him in all respects as Mrs. Chandless' servant. I considered that I paid him to save her the trouble."

Mary Carter servant to Mrs. Wilson, deposed: "I was Mrs. Chandless' maid: I have heard [109] her say she paid Hill for horses and coachman, and that she had nothing to do with the coachman (Howard) beyond paying him 'night money,' while he was out of town with her."

On interrogatory: "Howard was sometimes sent by deceased on errands: she gave him orders as she did to the other servants: he occupied two rooms over the stables. He never during my service waited at table."

A responsive plea denied the defendant's allegation, and pleaded "that Howard was hired by and went into the service of the deceased as coachman, in January, 1825; and that she herself selected him from among various applicants:" it then set forth his wages and allowances, both in town and country, and that he was to occupy the room over her stable; and that on his being so hired, deceased informed him that, "to save herself trouble, she always wished her coachman to receive his wages, except the extra pay when in the country, from the job-master who furnished her with horses; and that he might receive his wages from him either by weekly or monthly payments or in any way he pleased. That while in her service, Shepherd, Gale, and Hill supplied her with horses: that Howard never entered into any agreement with either of them, and was always treated by them as the servant of the deceased, and that she settled his rate of wages without consulting any job-master. That he, Howard, assisted, when there was company, in waiting at table; constantly went on errands for deceased, and was returned by her as her servant to the collector of the King's taxes. That after Mrs. Chandless' death he was taken into defendant's service; that [110] for about seven months afterwards Hill supplied her with horses, and that he remained in her service after Hill ceased to supply her."

On this allegation Mrs. Wilson's answers were taken; and four witnesses were examined; among others, Shepherd, the job-master, who deposed: "I never considered Howard as my servant: I did not consider that I had any control over him: I had no power to discharge him; he was entirely the servant of Mrs. Chandless."

Dodson for Mrs. Wilson. A job-coachman is not within the description of a servant living with the deceased. In Chilcot v. Bromley (12 Ves. 114) it was held that, under a general bequest to servants, a coachman provided with the carriage and horses by a job-master was not entitled. There the legacy was large—500l. and 20l. for mourning, with all the deceased's wearing apparel; but the principle of law equally applies to this case.

The King's advocate and Addams contrà. In Chilcot v. Bromley the job-master supplied a coachman according to the usual course of business, and paid him weekly wages. The circumstances of Chilcot v. Bromley are so different from those under consideration that they cannot be held to govern the present case. Here the testatrix's intention is clear that she contemplated including Howard in the bequest.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. This is a legacy suit brought against the exe-[111]-cutrix of the will of the late Mrs. Chandless. The words of the will are, "to each of my servants living with me at the time of my death, ten pounds." Howard claims as her coachman; and for this little legacy, though the testatrix left considerable property, he has been compelled to resort to this suit, consisting of a libel and two allegations, it being contended that this man was not her servant, and is not within the proper construction of the will, nor the intention of the testatrix, so as to be entitled to this legacy.

The deceased, who kept her carriage, jobbed her horses, for which she paid 200l. a year; and the job-man was for that sum to pay all expenses, and among the rest twenty-six shillings a week, as wages and board wages, to the coachman. It is not at all uncommon for a job-man to pay the wages of the servant of the person who hires the horses; but whether the coachman received his money from the hands of the job-man or from his mistress is not very material; the wages, at all events, came out of the pocket of the deceased. The question is whether Howard was the servant of the testatrix, and comes within the meaning of the words of the bequest. The case is quite distinguishable from that of Chilcot v. Bromley,(a) which has been cited. In that case the Master of the Rolls says, "The question is whether the plaintiff was a servant of the testator within the intent of this will. Can the testator be supposed to include a person whom he had not selected nor chosen to bring into his service for any definite period? It is not probable that a testator in such a situation as this testator, with the experience he had of the manner in which these ser-[112]-vants were changed, could have intended to put this person on a footing with servants brought into his house by a contract of his own, from preference arising out of previous inquiry into their characters and satisfaction with their services." So that the Master of the Rolls puts the case of Chilcot v. Bromley as a question of probable intention, on the part of the testator, depending upon the circumstances of the particular case.

(a) 12 Ves. 114. See also as to "who are entitled under the description of servants." Williams on Executors, v. ii. 735.

The coachman in that case did not live nor board in the deceased's house; and there the job-master hired the servant, and contracted to provide the deceased with a coachman, who, says the Master of the Rolls, "was so far in the testator's service as driving his carriage; but in consequence of a retainer by the other and a contract with him." The Master of the Rolls considered that the job-master could discharge the coachman at any period. There, also, the coachman had only driven the deceased for ten months, and the legacy in question was 500l. and 20l. for a suit of mourning. Here the legacy is only 10l., and the plaintiff was hired by the testatrix, she herself selecting him from various coachmen who applied for the place, and he remained with, and drove, her from 1825 till her death in 1829—nearly five years. The facts and the probabilities of the two cases are as remote as possible. Here the only circumstance to shew that there was no intention to include the coachman is, that the job-man was the hand to pay him his wages out of this round sum of 200l., and it is on that account maintained that Howard was not one of the deceased's servants. That seems to be the only ground of opposition. Shepherd, who, at the time the plaintiff was hired by the deceased, served the deceased as job-man, and who had been job-man to her husband, did not inquire the man's [113] character, and never exercised any authority over him: Howard was never employed by the job-men, but in the care of the job-horses let to the deceased: he lived in rooms over the stable on the deceased's premises; he assisted in waiting at table when there was company, and went on errands and messages when wanted. When out of town, at watering-places, he lodged in the house, and received from the deceased extra allowance. All the servants being on board wages, the deceased gave them a treat dinner at Christmas; but the coachman, being a married man, she did not ask him to dinner; but, more kindly, sent a leg of mutton for himself and his wife to enjoy together. The deceased hired her coachman without consulting her job-man: she changed her job-men but did not change her coachman: Howard continued the deceased's servant; and even after her death he remained with the executrix. At length he quitted her service, but Hill continued to job the horses; so that there was no connexion between the contract with the job-man and the service of the coachman.

Every circumstance, therefore, marks Howard as the deceased's servant: he is always so treated. Can I then suppose that, after living with the deceased for nearly five years—a period longer, it seems, than any other servant, and always giving satisfaction—the deceased did not intend to include him in this little remembrance of a 10l. legacy. I see not the least reason to suppose that she did propose to exclude him: but if there could have been any doubt, how could the executrix have hesitated to pay it? I think the resistance is very frivolous, and I pronounce for the legacy, and with full costs.

[114] KENRICK v. KENRICK. Consistory Court of London, 1831.—A suit for cruelty and adultery against the husband, and a recriminatory charge of adultery against the wife. The Chancellor of London, and, upon appeal, the Dean of the Arches (affirming the sentence), held the husband's cruelty and adultery not proved, and the adultery of the wife proved by the evidence of a single witness only to any undue familiarity, proximate act, or fact of adultery, which evidence, though confused, was corroborated by the evidence of the conduct of the wife.—The Court will not delay the hearing of a cause on an affidavit that a true bill has been found against a material witness for perjury in her evidence in such cause.—Quære, whether a conviction would be evidence.

On appeal from the Consistory of London.

This was a cause of separation, originally promoted by the wife, in the Consistory Court of London, for cruelty and adultery.

The libel pleaded the marriage of the parties—the one a widower, the other a widow—on the 9th of May, 1829: and in the 4th article alleged that during the latter part of 1829 the husband frequently, and without occasion, staid for several days together at Webb's Farm, Enfield, leaving his wife at his house in Foley Place; that his language and manner to her were harsh, insulting and cruel.

5. That in consequence of his ill-treatment they separated, in virtue of a deed executed on the 20th of January, 1830; that Mrs. K., relying on her husband's assurances, and ignorant of his adulterous intercourse, resumed cohabitation with him in London on the 8th of March, and on the 17th of April accompanied him to Webb's Farm.

6. Pleaded adultery with Maria Thomas, placed by K. as housekeeper at Webb's Farm, and by whom, prior thereto, K. had had children: and alleged that they had been seen to kiss each other; that he had been seen to have his arm round her waist, and that he called her "my love," and "my dear;" that on the 7th of April, 1830, he drove her to Barnet Fair and back; that he was often in her [115] bed-room, and from the 9th of May, 1829, to the middle of April, 1830, they at times slept together.

7. That while at Webb's Farm, after the 17th of April, K., in the presence of his servants, called his wife a strumpet, and falsely accused her of adultery; that he tore her dress, and repeatedly struck her violently with his clenched fist; that on the 2nd of June, 1830, he quarrelled with her, struck her, ordered her to leave the house, threatening to send for a constable; that she was hurt and terrified, and being, for the first time, apprised of his adultery with Thomas, finally quitted her husband on the 4th of June.

Thomas Burge, the first witness examined on the libel, deposed: "I went as bailiff to Webb's Farm on the 2nd of March, 1830, and lived there three months. I and my wife left on account of Mr. and Mrs. Kenrick's differences: they never met without quarrelling: his language was offensive and insulting to her: he told her she had been the death of her first husband. I have heard him say to his wife that she was as bad as a common prostitute. On the day I left, Mrs. Kenrick was speaking to my wife in the yard; K. ordered his wife to go in; she continued to speak to my wife, and K. then took his wife by the shoulders and shoved her in, saying, if she did not keep in he would send for a constable. I do not remember in his conduct anything like very severe cruelty or violence towards her."

On the 6th article. "Maria Thomas was housekeeper when I went to the farm: she quitted in the morning that Mrs. Kenrick came in the evening: K. drove her away in his gig. I know of no adultery with her and Kenrick: they were always very friendly: I have seen them, when he [116] came home at night, kiss each other. I never saw any other familiarities."

On the 7th. "I have heard K. accuse his wife of having lived in adultery with an acquaintance of his. On the day I left he pushed his wife with great violence into the house: he told her to take her things and leave the place."

On interrogatory. "Six months ago Mrs. Kenrick called to ask me to be a witness: I have not seen her since. I do not know whether Thomas is Kenrick's niece: he usually called her 'Maria.' She frequently went out with him in his chaise. I have heard Mrs. K. say, on the occasion of the quarrels, that she would leave her husband's house, for that she could not live with him."

Sarah Burge deposed: "Kenrick behaved very unkindly to his wife: she studied every thing to please him."

6. "When I and my husband went to the farm, Thomas acted as mistress: I thought she was Mrs. Kenrick, until after two or three days I found they had separate beds, and heard her say she had two children, one of which was at the farm for the last three or four weeks she remained; and the child used to call him 'Papa.' I really cannot say whether there was any adultery between K. and Thomas. I never saw any thing improper between them, beyond his calling her 'my dear,' and 'my love.' I saw them the evening before Thomas left the farm sitting on the sofa together: she was very unhappy at leaving the farm. I never saw K. and Thomas kiss, nor his arm round her waist, nor entering nor coming out of her room. I have heard him knock at her door and call her in the morning. On Barnet Fair day K. drove Thomas out, and at starting [117] said they were going to the fair. Occasionally I helped to make the beds: I never observed, while Thomas was at the farm, that either her bed or that of K. had the appearance of having been slept in by more than one person. While I lived at the farm I have no reason to form a belief that they committed adultery together. On the day K. pushed his wife into the house he tore her dress."

7. The witness confirmed her husband's evidence generally on this article.

On interrogatory. I never heard that Thomas was K.'s niece until just before I left. I saw K. twice, on his wife's refusal to go into the house, take her by the shoulders and push her with great force. After Mrs. K. had been at the farm a few weeks she said, if she should leave her husband, she would like me to live with her.

Two other witnesses deposed that K. behaved unkindly to his wife; but that they knew of no familiarities with Thomas; they had seen him, undressed, knocking at her door in the morning, and calling "Maria, Maria."

The counter allegation pleaded that K. took Webb's Farm at the request of his wife, and that he always treated her with kindness; and exhibited a letter from her, of the 5th of October, 1829, to Miss Paris, a daughter of a clergyman at Coventry, in which she said, "I think you will like Mr. Kenrick very much; he is very fond of me, and does every thing he possibly can to make me happy and comfortable." That after Mrs. K. abruptly left Foley Place, in November, Miss Paris endeavoured to induce her to return; that K. never committed adultery with Thomas, who was his niece.

The 7th article pleaded that in July, 1829, [118] K. became acquainted at Brighton with Mr. Elder, of Oxford Street, stable keeper; that Elder afterwards visited in Foley Place, and Mrs. K. made appointments for him there in K.'s absence: that Elder frequently, when he knew K. would be attending horse sales, visited her, and remained with her for a considerable time.

8. That after Mrs. K. had quitted her husband in November, she frequently, unknown to K., went to Elder's, and particularly on one Saturday in November she came about five o'clock, dined with him, and they were alone together during the evening and greater part of the night. That shortly after they had dined, and also a second time during the same evening, Ann Nickless, suspecting an improper intercourse, saw them, on both occasions, through the key-hole of the bed-room door, on the bed together: and pleaded adultery.

9. That Mrs. K., on several occasions subsequent to the said Saturday, was at Elder's till very late at night; that they laid down together on the sofa; and upon her leaving the house Elder went with her: and pleaded adultery.

10. That Elder often gave Mrs. K. night-gowns and wearing apparel which had belonged to his deceased wife; that both Mrs. K. and Elder strictly enjoined Nickless never to disclose that Mrs. K. came to Elder's house; and that she never did so disclose until after the commencement of this suit.

11. That K. consented to resume cohabitation in March, 1830, in compliance with the letters, now destroyed, but read by Morrey, his (K.'s) foreman, and who knew Mrs. K.'s writing.

12 and 13. That in May, 1830, Mrs. K. several [119] times came to London with K. and went out by herself; that on the 6th, about 2 p.m., Morrey saw her go into White House brothel, in Soho Square, with a stranger, and that they remained there upwards of three-quarters of an hour: that Morrey did not inform K. of this till after the commencement of this suit.

14. That Mrs. K. frequently at Webb's Farm quarrelled with K. without provocation; that on Thursday in the latter end of May, 1830, after a quarrel between K. and his wife, Mrs. K. went to London in a post-chaise, as she said, to consult with her solicitor about leaving her husband; that on her return she admitted to Mrs. White that she (Mrs. K.) had, on returning to live with K., no intention to remain long with him, and that her reason for coming back was to get some clothes and letters; and that she had on that day, when in London, called upon and informed Elder that she was again about to leave her husband, and that he, Elder, had offered to protect her.

Ann Nickless, a widow, aged fifty-three, examined on the 3d of June, 1831, on the 8th article. "I was housekeeper to Elder for about five years. I quitted last Christmas. About a year and a half before, as near as I can remember, Mr. and Mrs. Kenrick one Sunday dined, and together spent the evening, with Elder. After some time Mrs. K. used to come alone: this I think was not so early as November. At first she came with a Miss Paris: Elder walked out with them. One Saturday, I think after Christmas, about five p.m., Mrs. K. for the first time, as nearly as I can remember, came alone. I was at the door of the house, which is down the yard: Elder was in the yard looking about as if for somebody. Pre-[120]-sently Mrs. K. came down the yard: Elder went to her, and told her to run up stairs into the nursery as fast as she could: she passed me; ran up stairs, and Elder followed immediately. They dined and were alone together. It occurs to me that Mrs. K. had dined with E. in the early part of that week: she called about two, just as dinner was ready, and remained till nine: she told me at that time that she and K. were parted, and that K. had turned her out of doors. On the Saturday she remained until one in the morning. Nobody went into the room to them but myself: there was no one else in the house: they dined in the nursery, which is not so public as the parlour: Elder's bed-room adjoins the nursery: on the Saturday he and Mrs. K. went into it twice; the first time as soon as dinner was over. I was in the parlour; I distinctly heard them go. I suspected what was going forward, having previously observed several familiarities between them, which were very improper in a married woman like Mrs. K. I therefore listened to hear what I could: the bed-room is over the parlour: I plainly heard the noise of two persons getting on the bed, and presently afterwards that sort of breathing which left no doubt on my mind that such two persons were in the act of sexual intercourse. About half an hour afterwards K. came down stairs and told me to take the glasses away. I went up; and from the nursery went into the bed-room. Mrs. K. was there: the bed was very much tumbled, and had the appearance of having been lain on by two persons; I tucked it up before Mrs. K. who said nothing: the window blind was down, which was very unusual. Mrs. K.'s face was very much flushed. I said nothing to [121] her. After tea, as I passed the nursery door, which was ajar, and not seeing Elder or Mrs. K., I went very softly to the bed-room door, and peeped through the key-hole: the bed was just opposite the door, and I could see it very plainly, and almost every thing in the room. I saw Mrs. K. and E. in adultery."

9. Elder went out with her on the Saturday night, and did not return until after I had gone to bed. I went to bed about twelve. Several times before the Saturday he had gone out with her, but never afterwards that I remember: they used to sit in the parlour on the sofa together; and I have sometimes, on going into the room, seen them with their arms round each other's necks; at other times kissing each other; at others she has been lying on the sofa, and he has been putting her clothes down, and toying with her in some manner; but I cannot, except on the Saturday, depose to adultery.

10. One morning Elder came up stairs into the room where I was, and taking some of his late wife's clothes out of the drawers, said, speaking of Mrs. K. who was below—"Poor thing! I must let her have some things to change; for she has nothing but what she stands upright in!" I afterwards saw Mrs. K. take the bundle of things away. When Mrs. K. told me that she and K. had parted, she told me to deny that she ever was or ever came to the house; for were K. to know it, it would be Elder's ruin, and that K. would not mind giving her 20*l.* if I was to let him know she was in the house; she repeated to me her anxiety that K. should not know of her visits almost every time she came to the house: she used to say she loved Elder's little finger better [122] than K.'s whole body. I never disclosed any of these circumstances to K. (nor to any one) until about six weeks or two months ago: I never saw him from the time this happened until then, when he came to me with a lawyer, and after I had been asked a few questions I told them every thing I have now deposed.

On interrogatory. Mrs. K. was dressed on the Saturday in a black silk dress, with a velvet bonnet and veil. There was no light in the bed-room either time that I remember; and yet there must have been: they had candles in the nursery, and must have taken them into the bed-room; but I do not remember to have noticed them there. Elder's bed stood in the middle of the room between the door and window: it could not stand otherwise. The largest part of the bed could be seen through the key-hole of the door, particularly the foot of it, and it was across the foot that Mrs. K. and E. were lying. The key was turned so that a person could see through the hole; I always kept it turned round to prevent it from falling out.

Caroline Paris, aged twenty-eight. K. did not treat his wife with indifference or unkindness that I ever saw; they quarrelled sometimes; but it was as much her fault as his. She told me he was fond of her; that she might have what she wanted, and that at her request he took the house in the country.

[The evidence of this witness on the 4th article is given in the judgment.]

On interrogatory. I was intimately acquainted with Mrs. K. and her first husband—a clergyman in Shropshire: she was on a visit at my father's for a month, in the autumn of 1830: she was [123] treated by all the family (including myself) with great kindness, attention and respect: she mixed in the society that came to my father's and was received without reserve by our connexions, and treated by them with attention and respect, though they made certain remarks afterwards: she comported herself with general, though perhaps not perfect, propriety. There was at times a certain levity of language and behaviour more than was proper in a married woman. She accompanied me and a young lady to Leamington, and staid there with us. I occasionally called with Mrs. Kenrick at Elder's. It appeared to me that K. did not much like him: I never remember K. to have invited him but once: he treated him with civility merely.

Stephen Morrey, aged thirty-three, foreman to James Marks, horse-dealer. K. was a horse-dealer: I his foreman or salesman. I went into his employ about May, 1829, and remained a year. I boarded and lodged in the house. K. always behaved to his wife with kindness and indulgence: she told me that he took Webb's Farm to please her: and that she believed if she could eat gold she might have it: he had a house for her a considerable time at Brighton, and had three horses there for her use, and he must have been fond of her to do this, as he is rather a careful man.

7. About July or August, as nearly as I can remember, Elder became a visitor in Foley Place; and in about a month got into the habit of calling in K.'s absence—more frequently on Monday mornings—when K. was at Tattersall's: of this absence Elder could not, I think, have been ignorant. Elder used to ask if K. was at home; if he was, he waited to be asked to walk in; if he was not at [124] home, he would remark he would just step in and ask Mrs. K. how she was. The only sitting room is up stairs. Elder would remain with Mrs. K. from half an hour to an hour: I sometimes went up stairs while they were together in the parlour: they were very friendly; but I cannot say that I saw at any of these times any improper familiarities: his visits were as often as two or three times a week.

11. K. was much distressed at the separation between him and his wife. I was at that time much in his confidence, and he consulted me upon solicitations made to him to take her back, and shewed me letters on the subject; the first was anonymous, describing how miserable Mrs. K. was, and entreating him to receive her: he asked me what I thought he had better do; and afterwards shewed me other letters to the same effect (purporting to come from Mr. and Mrs. May, friends of Mrs. K., and residing at Brighton), and he consulted me upon them. Some of the letters may have been written by Mrs. K., but I am not certain. I know not what has become of them: K. is a very careless man about letters.

12. On Friday, 6th May, Mrs. K. came to town as usual with K. I speak to the day from reference to a memorandum I made as to some business of my own about which I was on that day, with K.'s permission, in the city. On my return, I was in Crown Street, Soho, when I caught sight of Mrs. K. coming down the same street; it must have been between two and three: a gentleman was with her, a perfect stranger to me. I saw them turn the corner of a small street called Sutton Street, leading from Crown Street into Soho Square. I was on the opposite side of the [125] way, and about fifty yards from them: it was quite in my way to cross Soho Square to get to Foley Place: I therefore followed so as to avoid being seen by Mrs. K. I saw her and the gentleman enter a large white house the front of which is in Soho Square; it is a brothel or house of ill fame, though of a superior description, and goes by the name of the White House. I waited near the door for about ten minutes, but Mrs. K. and the gentleman did not come out again in that time. I was late and therefore did not continue watching longer. Upon recollection it may have been near half an hour but I think not so much as three-quarters that I waited. I left K.'s employ a few days afterwards without disclosing these circumstances. I went again into his employ in January last, and left it about two months ago; and shortly before I had some conversation with his solicitor about my giving evidence in this cause; and I then communicated what I have stated as to the White House. This was the first communication I made of the fact, either to K. or to any person on his behalf.

On interrogatory. K., as my security, had to pay money for me. I owe him about 100l., or perhaps rather more. I have made no communications as to my evidence, except as deposed, to the solicitor: he was urging me to give evidence as to K.'s general kind behaviour to Mrs. K. I was trying to avoid it, saying there were many who could give better evidence than I could; he told me it was better I should come willingly, or he must oblige me: I remarked that it might make unpleasantness between me and K., and that I might lose my situation; but he undertook that it should not, and I then told him what I knew [126] about Mrs. K. going to the White House. I did, however, lose my situation by it, for K.'s behaviour to me afterwards became so altered, and I had so much difficulty to do anything to please him, that we found it better to part. I am unable to recollect at what time Mrs. K. returned to Foley Place on the 6th of May; but she did return in time to go back with K. to the farm; I do not recollect her dress on the 6th of May; nor to have seen her on that day save when she went into the White House. Having neglected to inform K. of what I had seen for the first day or two, it became a matter of greater delicacy; and I became less inclined to speak about it: I had also some little hope that Mrs. K. might alter her conduct. I left K. because of my embarrassments and had no fixed employment till I returned to his service.

Elizabeth Sullivan deposed that Thomas passed as K.'s niece, that she slept with Thomas's child in one bed, and Thomas occupied the other; and that she had no reason to believe they ever committed adultery together, and that she never saw any thing improper in their conduct.

Elizabeth White (wife of James White, formerly carter to Mr. Kenrick). Deposed to the declarations pleaded in the 14th article, adding, "that Mrs. K. said she should not accept Elder's offer, for fear Mr. K. should hear of it and be jealous, and that she should, on leaving him, take a lodging."

Elizabeth Mizen. I was in K.'s service on his second marriage; he was very kind to Mrs. K., and she admitted it. On the 7th she deposed: Elder used to call as often as two or three times a week; he would inquire of me if my master was at home: he very seldom was; but if he was, E. [127] did not go upstairs: K. did not invite him; but in the evening when he called Mr. or Mrs. K., one or both, would tell me to shew him upstairs. I think that Elder knew the day on which my master was usually out: his visits to Mrs. K. sometimes lasted only a few minutes; sometimes a quarter of an hour: but after he had gone upstairs, as they were friends, I gave myself no more trouble about the matter: and I did not always see him go away.

Mich. Term, 1st Session.—After publication of the evidence had passed, an exceptive allegation was offered in the Consistory Court, on the part of the wife, to the testimony of Ann Nickless on the 8th article, and on the 12th interrogatory. The exceptive allegation pleaded that Mrs. Kenrick never dined with Elder in the nursery of his house, nor remained with him till one o'clock in the morning, nor went with him into his bed-room, nor had sexual intercourse with him. It further pleaded that, from the relative position of the bed and door of the bed-room, no part of the bed could be seen through the keyhole.

A plan of the room was exhibited.

Addams for the husband, opposed the allegation, and cited Foley v. Foley.(a)

Phillimore and Haggard contrà.

[128] Per Curiam. The only question is whether the eighth article of the

---

(a) In Foley v. Foley the libel charged the wife with adultery both in London and in the country; but the evidence upon the libel was shortly as follows:—

John Davis deposed (in the words of the libel) that on the 30th of September, 1784, as he was walking in the road adjoining the shrubbery of Stoke Park, about six in the afternoon, he heard a female cry out three times, "Oh, Dear, you hurt me:" that on looking through the shrubbery trees he saw the parties charged committing adultery.

Benjamin Smith (a marksman, aged 25) used to drive, as postillion to the parties out in the country, and he deposed to four separate acts of adultery.

There was also a letter from the paramour changing the day of appointment from Sunday to Monday, because on that latter day the husband would be absent from home.

Damages against the paramour, 2500l.

An exceptive allegation was offered in the evidence of John Davis, which pleaded that the parties charged were not in the shrubbery, as libellate; and further, "that by reason of the thickness and closeness of the trees, shrubs, and hedges which separate the said shrubbery from the road, it was impossible for John Davis, or any person in the road, to see into the walk within the shrubbery, so as to distinguish any person or object whatever."

This exceptive allegation was rejected.

No other allegation nor evidence was tendered on either side; and the Court (Sir William Wynne) signed a sentence of separation.

Dr. Harris and Dr. Scott for the husband.

Dr. Bever for the wife.

husband's allegation is sufficiently minute and specific, so that it might have been counter-pleaded before publication; and I am of opinion that it might have been so counter-pleaded; and that the evidence of the witness objected to upon it is not extra-articulate. This allegation, therefore, is not sustainable; and the Court will accordingly adhere to the well-known rule—that a party cannot plead in contradiction to a witness what he might have pleaded in contradiction to the plea—and rejects the present allegation.(a)

[129] Upon the rejection of the exceptive allegation the conclusion of the cause was rescinded, at the prayer of the husband's proctor, to enable him to plead and prove the marriage. One witness was examined as to the fact of marriage: and the principal cause was then argued.

Judgment—Dr. Lushington. The first question is whether either the adultery or cruelty charged in the libel has been proved: and I am quite satisfied that legal cruelty is not established. Quarrels and, if implicit credit can be given to the witnesses on the libel, much improper language by the husband passed, but there was no conduct to excite in the wife any reasonable apprehension of danger to her person.

In regard to the charge of adultery which is pleaded in the libel to have taken place with Maria Thomas, Mr. Kenrick, in his allegation, expressly avers that she was "his niece;" if this averment of the husband had been proved, it would have removed all ground of suspicion, but it is, I much lament, left without proof. The Court does not require or expect that such an incidental averment should be established through the medium of proof as strict as in a pedigree cause; but here it might easily have been proved by Mr. Kenrick's own son: no witness, however, has been examined to this point, and the averment is not proved.

But is the affirmative of the husband's guilt proved? The parties are never seen in any indecent, nor even suspicious, situation: no proximate act nor improper familiarities are spoken to. Burge and his wife, two of the witnesses on the libel, depose that in their opinion there was no [130] criminal connexion between Kenrick and Maria Thomas. They certainly depose to two circumstances of suspicion, viz. that Thomas's child called Mr. Kenrick "Papa;" and also that on the very day on which Mrs. Kenrick went down to the farm at Enfield, Thomas quitted it; and that Mr. Kenrick drove her away in his gig. The facts, then, proved on the libel, do not establish adultery, and I am of opinion that both on this charge, and on the charge of cruelty, there is a failure of proof.

The more difficult and important part of this case remains, viz. whether there is proof of adultery against Mrs. Kenrick. The witnesses, Nickless and Morrey, it has been said, are not entitled to credit; and an impression has been attempted to be made on my mind that a single witness is insufficient to support a charge of adultery; but I am not, in this case, under the necessity of considering such a proposition, although I am not prepared to say that one clear and unimpeached witness is insufficient; but it is hardly possible to conceive a case so naked of proof as to reduce it, exclusively of all collateral circumstances, to the testimony of a single witness, unconfirmed or unimpeached; and here the case clearly is not so destitute.

The principal witness on the part of the husband is Ann Nickless. The general character of this witness is not impeached; her testimony then is impeachable only on two grounds—first, the probability or improbability of the circumstances to which she deposes; secondly, her manner of deposing. It has been argued that she speaks to a grossly improbable story: but the whole of the facts are to be considered. There may be discre-[131]-pancies in her evidence, and she may confound the time of certain visits, yet I cannot say that these circumstances will entirely discredit her. From my experience, I am well aware that when witnesses are examined after an interval of time from the occurrence of the facts to which they are to speak, they will differ from the plea, and also from themselves; and particularly, if there was nothing at the time to fix a circumstance on the mind of the witness, an inaccuracy as to a date is extremely probable. But there is much to fix in her mind the material transactions to which Nickless deposes.

It is said again that "this witness has been tampered with, that Kenrick has given her half a sovereign, and that the expressions which she says Mrs. Kenrick made use of to her, viz. "That Mr. Kenrick would not mind giving her (the witness) 20l. if he knew of Mrs. Kenrick's visits to Elder," are so strange and incredible that "no one in her senses was ever so besotted" as to make such a declaration. But if I once believe the probability of adultery having been committed, I shall not hesitate to believe such a declaration; for it is quite notorious that a party living in this state of profligacy soon ceases to use any due precaution against detection. But does Nickless stand alone? Are there not some subsidiary witnesses? There is the evidence of Miss Paris, of Elizabeth Mizen, and of Mrs. White. These witnesses prove a degree of intimacy with Elder which is not quite consistent with female propriety. Miss Paris proves that, on the night on which Mrs. Kenrick quitted her husband's house, she was not indifferent to Elder; I refer to the expression of Mrs. Kenrick on that night to her husband—"You [132] need not sit making faces there against Mr. Elder." Mizen speaks of the frequent visits of Elder to Mrs. Kenrick when he must have known that Kenrick was absent from home: and if the Court believes White, she speaks to a declaration of Mrs. Kenrick, which, in plain English, is that Elder had offered to take her, Mrs. Kenrick, into keeping. These subsidiary circumstances confirm Nickless. Nickless also speaks to other circumstances, which could not have been invented, such as to Elder giving her (Mrs. Kenrick) some of his late wife's clothes. It was also suggested in the argument that if the adultery which the allegation pleads to have passed in November, and Nickless deposes to as happening after Christmas, had been laid in the plea as spoken to in the evidence, the party would have counter-pleaded it, and proved an alibi. But if a plea avers a particular time and place, and the evidence of the witness to that part of the plea is quite at variance with it, I know of no rule that would preclude the party from counter-pleading; and if the facts cannot be counter-pleaded before publication, the Court itself is not precluded from rescinding the conclusion of the cause for that purpose. In this case an exceptive allegation, after publication, was offered, and in it no notice was taken of this variation.

---

(a) Verelst v. Verelst, 2 Phill. 150. Atkinson v. Atkinson, 2 Add. 484. Burgoyne v. Free, 2 Hagg. Ecc. Rep. 480. Whish and Woollatt v. Hesse, 3 Hagg. Ecc. Rep. 680.

It only remains for the Court to dispose of the witness, Morrey; and considering every part of his evidence, and the utter impossibility of contradicting it, and being satisfied with the testimony of Nickless, corroborated by the other evidence to which I have referred, I do not think it necessary for me to sift his, Morrey's, evidence, or further investigate it. I am satisfied that the charge of [133] adultery is sufficiently proved against Mrs. Kenrick, and I pronounce for a divorce at the prayer of the husband.

From this sentence the wife appealed.

A true bill having been found at the Old Bailey on the 6th of April, 1832, against Ann Nickless, for perjury in her evidence in this suit, she had entered into her own recognizance to take her trial on the 17th of May.

Phillimore, on this day (8th of May), moved the Court, on affidavit, to postpone the hearing of this cause till the result of the indictment should be known.

Addams contrà. The witness was examined and cross-examined in June, 1831; the trial on the indictment might have taken place at the last April Sessions.

Per Curiam (Sir John Nicholl). I am unwilling to delay the hearing of this cause; I shall therefore assign it for sentence on the next Court. I can stay my decision for the result of the indictment, if I shall think that the justice of the case requires it.

The cause was accordingly assigned for sentence, the costs of the wife being first paid; and on the next session it was argued by Addams for the respondent: Phillimore and Haggard for the appellant.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. This was a suit brought by the wife, charging [134] her husband with adultery and cruelty: the husband denied the charges, and gave in a recriminatory plea, alleging the adultery of the wife: and the sentence of the Consistory Court of London was—that the wife had failed in proof of her libel, but that the husband had proved his allegation. From this decree the wife has appealed. Two questions are to be considered: first—whether the wife has proved her plea; secondly, whether the husband has failed in his defence, or in his recriminatory charge.

The marriage took place in May, 1829; it is confessed; and it is also proved by the husband's son, who was present. Mr. Kenrick was at that time a widower—not very young, for his son describes himself as twenty-eight years of age: his second wife was the widow of a clergyman. At the period of this marriage the husband kept livery stables in Foley Place; and shortly afterwards he also took White Webb's Farm, in the parish of Enfield. It would seem from a letter of the wife to her friend, Miss Paris, that for some time they lived happily together: and in October, 1829, Miss Paris, at the special and pressing invitation of Mrs. Kenrick, visited and stayed with her for five or six weeks.

The parties had previously formed an acquaintance at Brighton with a person of the name of Elder, of whom, it appears, the husband after a time became jealous. Miss Paris thus speaks to this jealousy, and to Mrs. Kenrick's leaving her husband's house: "I remember a quarrel, which led to Mrs. Kenrick's leaving Mr. Kenrick's house in Foley Place: it was about a week before I left. They had had a few words in the morning, and were very distant with each other in the evening. [135] As late as ten in the evening a Mr. Elder came in, of whom Mr. Kenrick was rather jealous, and it was generally about him that he and Mrs. K. quarrelled, when they did so. Mr. K. was rather sulky, and Mrs. K. was taking little notice of him, which annoyed him very much, for he always liked a great deal of attention from her. Something, but I forget what, was said by Mr. K. which induced Mrs. K. to observe to him, 'You need not sit there making faces or motions about Mr. Elder'—a very improper remark, as it appeared to me, in Mr. Elder's presence" [and in this opinion I certainly must concur with the witness]; "Mrs. Kenrick got more angry afterwards, and the husband appeared very much annoyed but spoke very little: at length she said to him, 'You know I have often declared I would leave you, and I will:' still I did not think she was in earnest, but a few minutes afterwards she went out of the room; he followed her; I remained: he returned in a few minutes, saying that his wife was gone, but he did not suppose she was gone far. After a little time Elder went away, and K. again went to look for Mrs. K.; he returned, and said he could not find her: he was much vexed: I never saw any one so distressed: I did not see her again till in August or September, 1830."

These are the circumstances which are stated to have induced this lady to retire from her husband's house: and I must bear them in mind, especially the observation as to Elder, in reference to the subsequent charge which the husband has brought against her. The parties after this lived separate, and a deed of separation was prepared in January, 1830; where the wife lived during the separation does not appear; but she returned [136] to her husband in March of that year, and again withdrew on the 4th of June. There is no proof that this reconciliation was at the husband's request; the tendency of Morrey's evidence, on the 11th article of the allegation, shews that it was desired by the wife. Mrs. Kenrick immediately took out a citation against her husband, which was not returned till the first session of Michaelmas Term. This was not rapid; the husband appeared on the second session of that term; but no libel was given till the third session of Hilary Term, 1831. On this libel five witnesses have been examined; and it is impossible to say that they establish either cruelty or adultery. The charge of cruelty, indeed, has scarcely been noticed in argument; and there is nothing in the depositions to lead to the conclusion that the husband has committed adultery. No indecent familiarity is proved, nor any expression beyond what would occur between an uncle and a niece; the circumstance of the child calling Mr. Kenrick "Papa" is at most a circumstance of suspicion; it might arise from his being the god-papa. There is not only then a failure of proof on the libel—which is not to be left out of my consideration when I look to the subsequent conduct of the wife—but the evidence for the defence—that of Sullivan in particular—goes further: it disproves the libel.

The only question, therefore, is whether the recrimination is proved; and if the witness, Nickless, be believed, there can be no doubt about it. She is a single witness; but if circumstances support her testimony it is sufficient. There need not be two witnesses: one witness and circumstances in corroboration are all that the law in [137] these cases requires. It is true that Nickless gives her evidence with some degree of confusion; but a variation between the plea and the witness as to time is of little importance: the solicitor in taking her statement, or the proctor in drawing the allegation, might mistake. So as to the number of visits at Elder's, there is some confusion; but there is not sufficient for the Court to say that this witness has not deposed honestly and truly: still her evidence requires corroboration; and I think that the conduct of the wife herself in leaving her husband's house, as detailed in

Miss Paris' evidence, coupled with the other evidence upon the allegation, is sufficient to corroborate Nickless. The wife leaves her husband's house, almost, it may be inferred, with an invitation to Elder to follow, and absents herself from some months. That Mrs. Kenrick cultivated Elder's acquaintance is obvious. Miss Paris states that during her visit Mrs. Kenrick occasionally went to Elder's, and her servant, Elizabeth Mizen, and also Morrey, prove that Elder was in the habit of calling at Kenrick's, and that these calls were on a day when it would seem Elder must have known of Kenrick's absence from home. It is also proved that on the occasion of these visits Elder was alone and up stairs with Mrs. Kenrick. These are suspicious visits. There is also the evidence of White as to Mrs. Kenrick's declaration—that "Elder had offered to protect her, and find her a home." The circumstances, therefore, in corroboration of Nickless, are sufficient. Some observations have been made on Morrey, but, upon the whole, they do not discredit him: and the charge to which he deposes on the 12th article, of seeing Mrs. Kenrick retire with a gentleman—a stranger—to a [138] brothel, is confirmatory of the husband's allegation. The testimony of this witness may not establish a fact of adultery, yet it furnishes a strengthening circumstance of proof in connexion with the general evidence. Even if the fact stood alone, and were sufficiently established, it would, in the judgment of Sir George Hay,(a) and according to the decisions of these Courts, go far to make out a case of adultery.(b)[1] The second se-[139]-paration of the wife from her husband, without a cause, tends also to the same conclusion. I cannot, upon the whole view of the case, arrive at any other decision than what was taken by the Court below, and I therefore affirm the sentence and remit the cause.

In regard to the bill of indictment found against Nickless, it does not appear on whose evidence it was found: it might have been on the evidence of the party herself, or on that of her paramour. I fully concur in the case of Maclean v. Maclean upon this point (2 Hagg. Ecc. Rep. 601); and on reference also to the cases there cited,(b)[2] I am satisfied that I adopted the right course in not postponing the hearing of this cause. Even if the witness had been convicted of perjury, and if Mrs. Kenrick had been a witness on the trial, I should feel very great hesitation in holding that the conviction could be received in evidence in this suit.

Sentence affirmed.

(a) See Eliot v. Eliot (cited in Williams v. Williams), 1 Hagg. Con. 302. In Eliot's case, Dr. Bettesworth, jun., held that there was a failure of proof. The husband appealed to the Court of Arches; and the Dean of Arches, Sir George Hay, reversed the judgment of the Consistory Court of London, and pronounced for the separation.

(b)[1] Wood v. Wood, Delegates, Nov. 25th, 1789, before Mr. Baron Hotham, Mr. Justice Buller, Mr. Justice Heath, Dr. Fisher, and Dr. Battine. This was a suit of divorce, by reason of adultery, brought by the husband against his wife originally in the Consistory Court of London. Nine witnesses were examined on the libel, and the cause was heard on the evidence of the plaintiff only. The Chancellor of London decreed for the separation. This sentence was affirmed upon the same evidence in the Court of Arches; and the cause in the Delegates was heard also upon the same evidence as in the two former instances. For the wife, it was argued—that the chief evidence relied on was Mrs. Wood's having been watched into a house of ill fame, called Hooper's hotel, in Soho Square, where she met M. D. several times. That a woman might be induced to go every length except the last, and if that last step were not proved there could be no proof of adultery.

Buller, J., said there were many cases in the King's Bench where the adultery was established on presumptive evidence; and damages given: and Dr. Battine observed that the sentence in Eliot v. Eliot in the Ecclesiastical Court was founded on the presumption arising from Mrs. Eliot having accompanied a man to a house of ill fame. Sentence affirmed. [From the MSS. of the late Dr. Swabey.]

See also the observations of Sir William Wynne in note (b) to Timmings v. Timmings, 3 Hagg. Ecc. Rep. 82. Also of Lord Stowell in Loveden v. Loveden, 2 Hagg. Con. 24-5. And see Astley v. Astley, 1 Hagg. Ecc. Rep. 719.

(b)[2] Thurtell v. Beaumont, 1 Bingh. 339; Warwick v. Bruce, 4 M. and S. 140; Bartlett v. Pickersgill, 4 East, 577.

SWIFT v. SWIFT, OTHERWISE KELLY. Arches Court, Mich. Term, 3rd Session, 1832.—In answers, a party, 1st, is bound only to answer to facts, not to his own motives, nor to his belief of the motives of another person: and 2ndly, where the plea avers ignorance of the real nature of a transaction by a party to such transaction and to the suit, the other party is, in his answers to such plea, allowed to state facts, inferring full knowledge thereof and acquiescence therein. A party is not bound to answer, when his answer would criminate himself, nor (as semble) when it would tend to degrade him.

[Referred to, Redfern v. Redfern, [1891] P. 148.]

This was a cause of restitution of conjugal rights promoted by William Richard Swift against Elizabeth Catherine Swift. The lady, at the commencement of the suit, being a minor, appeared by her guardian, and described herself as a spinster.

[140] The libel pleaded that Mr. Swift and Miss Kelly agreed to be privately married, and, in the third article, alleged that in order to effect a marriage at Rome, they by the advice of the Abbé de Sair, an ecclesiastic of the Roman Church, respectively, on the 24th of March, 1830, abjured the Protestant religion, received absolution, and became members of the Roman Catholic Church.

The fourth pleaded that, with the concurrence of Miss Kelly, a marriage licence was obtained from the cardinal vicar, and in pursuance of it Mr. Swift and Miss Kelly were, "in the afternoon of the twenty-fifth of March, 1830, in the apartments of the said Richard Swift, lawfully joined together in holy matrimony according to the rites and ceremonies prescribed by the Council of Trent, which is received and obeyed as law in the city of Rome."

The seventh pleaded that by the laws and customs of Rome the aforesaid marriage was good and valid to all intents and purposes.

The eighth, ninth, and tenth pleaded consummation of the marriage, and clandestine visits of Swift to the bed-room of his said wife both at Rome and at Naples.

An allegation, responsive to this libel, after pleading (in contradiction of the third article of the libel) in its own third article that W. R. Swift did not, as untruly alleged, apply to the Abbé de Sair for advice and assistance in respect to any proposed agreement of marriage between him and Miss Kelly with her knowledge or consent, nor communicate to her that he had so applied, nor any thing in respect thereof, further pleaded: that Miss Kelly never gave her consent [141] to the abjuration of her religion for the purpose of becoming a member of the Roman Catholic Church, neither did she ever, either in fact, or truly, or bonâ fide, or at all abjure the Protestant religion, nor receive absolution nor confirmation, nor were any penances enjoined upon or performed by her, nor did she ever do any other act whatever with her own privity and knowledge in order to become a member of the said Roman Catholic Church: that she has always been and still remains a member of the Established Church of England and Ireland. That W. R. Swift never did make any real and sincere abjuration of his religion, nor receive absolution or confirmation, nor were penances enjoined upon or performed by him according to the rites of Holy Mother Church of Rome: that, if he did in fact make a pretended abjuration of the Protestant religion and receive absolution, yet that such abjuration and all other acts relating to the same were not bonâ fide, but merely colourable, and for the purpose of fraudulently carrying into effect his intentions with respect to the said marriage: that Swift never did truly or bonâ fide become a member of the Roman Catholic Apostolical Church; that he was and still is a member of the Established Church of England and Ireland, and has never professed or been admitted a member of any other church or religion.

4. That no application was made to the Cardinal Vicar of Rome by W. R. S. for leave and licence to celebrate a marriage between him and Miss Kelly with her knowledge and concurrence (as untruly alleged); for that she did not at the time (i.e. on the 25th of March, 1830) entertain any intention or manifest by any declaration or act any intention of being united in marriage with [142] Swift, nor was she aware that any marriage was being had or celebrated, and that they were never joined together in holy matrimony or pronounced to be lawful husband and wife according to the rites and ceremonies prescribed by the Council of Trent, nor in any way whatever with her privity, knowledge, or consent. That between eight and nine of the evening of the 25th of March, 1830, she having gone up-stairs into one of the apartments of the Comtesse de Molandi (Swift's mother) by Swift's desire, found herein with him three persons—strangers to her: that she remained in the room for t about five minutes, during which time one or two papers were presented to her, which she was requested to sign, and which she did without looking over the same, supposing them to contain the consent to her marriage to Swift on her coming of age; that after this she immediately returned down-stairs to her mother's apartments. That on the said occasion nothing was done by Miss K. save the signing of the said papers, nor did any thing further pass between her or any of the other persons then present than the giving her assent to such her signature in their presence as witnesses. That if any pretended ceremony of marriage did take place (as untruly alleged) the same was fraudulently practised, and without her privity, knowledge, or consent.

5. That Miss Kelly, feeling great uneasiness at having signed the said papers unknown to her mother, she, a few days afterwards, communicated the same to her: that Miss Kelly remained in entire ignorance that any ceremony of marriage had taken place on the evening of the 25th of March until some days afterwards, when, having accidentally met Swift, she told him that she had informed [143] her mother what she had done on that evening, and he then, for the first time, acquainted her that a marriage had been on the 25th celebrated between them, and added, "that he considered her as his wife:" that Miss K. denied that any ceremony of marriage had taken place between them, expressed great indignation at his conduct, and that she felt assured that it would not be considered a valid marriage, and that she would hold no further communication with him.

The twelfth pleaded that William Richard Swift did not immediately after the said pretended marriage, or at any other time subsequently, or at all, retire to the bed-chamber of the said Elizabeth Catherine Kelly; nor was the said W. R. Swift ever admitted into her bed-chamber, nor did any sexual intercourse ever take place between them.

The allegation consisted of fifteen articles; but the other articles are not deemed material for the report for which the above articles are printed.

The allegation was opposed.

Trinity Term, 4th Session.—Phillimore and Dodson for Mr. Swift. The allegation, as far as it denies the facts or the law, as pleaded in the libel, or as far as it sets forth relevant facts, is not opposed. The third article is the most objectionable, viz. that Miss Kelly (as she is described) never did "either in fact, or truly, or bonâ fide, or at all, abjure the Protestant religion, nor receive absolution." The Court cannot inquire as to the feelings of conscience in a party, the words "bonâ fide" seem as if the other side distrusted their own case. It is of no importance of what religious persuasion the lady now [144] is: she must be taken to be, for the purposes of this case, of the creed she professed at her marriage. It is not now competent to her to explain away her own act. Again, it is pleaded that her abjuration was not bonâ fide: how can that averment be proved?

The King's advocate and Lushington contrà, were stopped by the Court.

Per Curiam. I am at a loss to know what part of this allegation requires to be reformed. It is admitted to be in part admissible. The allegation is contradictory as to the law, as pleaded in the libel, and also states the facts differently. Each party states the circumstances in their own way; and is entitled so to do.

Allegation admitted.(a)

Mr. Swift's answers to the third, fourth, and fifth articles of the allegation were as follow:—

[145] 3. Respondent admits "that, by error, it is in the libel alleged that to

---

(a) Trinity Term, By-Day.—On the second session of this term an application had been made to the Court for the depositions taken at Rome upon the libel to be inspected by the registrar in order to ascertain whether the interrogatories had been administered, there being a suspicion on the part of Miss Kelly's advisers that they had not been. This application had been refused: and the inspection was now moved for again, in order that the interrogatories, if found not to have been, might be, administered on the requisition which would issue to take evidence upon the defensive allegation.

Per Curiam. No blame attaches for the repetition of this motion: but it would be extremely dangerous for the Court to grant it. It is right for the proctor to do what he thinks will properly promote his client's interests, or vindicate his own diligence: but I must reject the motion.

carry into effect the agreement (as to the marriage) he, in the beginning of March, 1830, applied for advice and assistance to the Abbé de Sair, and says that it was to the Abbé Pifferi to whom he so applied, and that the application was made with the knowledge and consent of E. C. Swift (Kelly); and that he informed her of it and what had passed. That respondent denies that E. C. S. never gave her consent to the abjuration of her religion and becoming a member of the Roman Catholic Church, and says that she did in fact, and, as he believes, in the form and manner required by the laws of Rome, abjure the Protestant religion, and that she received absolution and confirmation as was required on that occasion, but whether she did so truly and bonâ fide he knows not to answer: that penance was enjoined upon her (and upon him) but was not enforced, and consequently not performed; and he believes that she did all such acts as were necessary in order to her becoming a member of the Roman Catholic Church; and that all the acts which were done were voluntary, and done with her entire privity and knowledge, and that she was by competent authority admitted a member of the Church of Rome. Respondent submits to the law and the judgment of the Court that he is not bound to answer whether the abjuration he made of his religion was real and sincere; but he says that he did make that abjuration in the form and manner prescribed by the ecclesiastical authorities at Rome, and that he did receive such absolution or confirmation as was necessary in order to his being truly and bonâ-fide admitted a member of the Roman Catholic Church."

[146] 4. "That the application to the cardinal vicar by respondent for leave and licence to celebrate a marriage between him and E. C. S. was made with her full concurrence and knowledge; and that until the same was obtained he personally and almost daily communicated to her the result of his application and his hopes of success; and that she entertained and declared an intention and desire of being united in marriage with respondent; that she asked him who were to be the witnesses to the marriage, and requested they might not be Englishmen whom she knew. That shortly previous to the marriage he declared to her that, although she had repeatedly promised and consented to be married to him, yet if she repented that she had done so, and did not from her heart wish to be married by a Roman Catholic priest after previously abjuring her religion, she was entirely at liberty to retract her promise, but she of her own free accord declared her desire that her marriage should be so celebrated: and on the 25th of March, 1830, they were joined together in holy matrimony, and pronounced lawful husband and wife; and he believes and submits to the law and judgment of the Court that they were so joined according to the rites and ceremonies prescribed by the Council of Trent: and he declares that E. C. S. was fully aware and perfectly understood that by the ceremony which was performed she and respondent were so married to each other: and respondent admits that according to the English mode of reckoning the same took place at a later hour than between eight and nine in the evening, namely, at about ten, but according to the mode of reckoning observed at Rome, the same took place at five. That E. C. S. freely and voluntarily went [147] up stairs from the apartments in which she and her mother resided to the apartments in which respondent and his mother resided, and into his room; that she so went up knowingly and in consequence of the previous arrangement made with her concurrence and privity for the clandestine marriage of herself and respondent, and for the purpose of having the same then and there solemnized; that she there found the Abbé Ludovico Lepri, a Roman ecclesiastic of rank, specially appointed by the Pope, or cardinal vicar, who has the same power, to perform the marriage ceremony, and also Senors Mazio and Gregori, who attended as witnesses, whose persons, he believes, were entirely unknown to her; and says it was at her desire that strangers were witnesses: that she remained in the room for more than about five minutes, viz. for half an hour, or twenty minutes at the least; that two papers were successively, before and after the marriage, presented to her; one, her abjuration, which she calmly and deliberately read and repeated; that she was asked by Abbé Lepri or the witnesses, in the English or Italian language, if she understood what she read, and having declared that she did, was requested to sign the same; that the other document was the record of the marriage, the contents of which she also well knew and understood, and so declared, having been asked in Italian by the priest (Abbé Lepri), before the ceremony of marriage, if she knew for what purpose she attended, she answered 'Yes, perfectly!' and respondent positively denies that she signed the documents supposing they only contained her consent to her marriage to respondent on her coming of age; and also that nothing was done on her part save [148] the signing of the documents, or that nothing further passed save giving her assent to such signatures: for that she well knew that the ceremony of marriage had been regularly and fully performed, that she answered distinctly the usual questions put to her by the priest, viz. whether she took respondent to be her wedded husband? She answered 'Yes!' She also received most willingly and without the slightest hesitation the marriage ring which respondent put on her finger, and afterwards she returned down stairs to her mother's apartments, and from thence retired to her own bed-chamber, where, in consequence of their said marriage, she on that night admitted respondent into her bed and to the rights of a husband, and the marriage was then and there consummated."

5. "Respondent does not know or believe that E. C. S., feeling great uneasiness at having signed the said two documents unknown to her mother, was thereby induced to communicate the same to her; but says that, after the marriage was had and celebrated, E. C. S. permitted him in a secret manner to go into her bed-chamber every night, and to remain in bed with her for several hours, and that one morning, about a week after the marriage, Mrs. Kelly having forced open the door of her daughter's bed-room, which door she was in the habit of securing by a string, there being no bolt or lock, the respondent in great haste escaped, as was agreed in case of alarm or danger of being discovered, out of the room by another door: and he believes that Mrs. Kelly, having seen or heard him leave the room, or having suspected that he had been therein, interrogated her in respect thereto, and she was thereby induced, as she told respondent the same morning, having [149] gone up to his chamber for that purpose, to make some confession that she had been clandestinely married to respondent, but concealed many circumstances as to the marriage, especially that witnesses were present: and he says that on the next night E. C. S. was compelled by her mother to sleep in a bed-chamber within her own room, for the purpose, as he believes, of preventing further sexual intercourse between them, notwithstanding which she constantly, and he believes without the intermission of one single night, continued to admit respondent through her said mother's bed-room, after she had retired to rest, and into her own bed-chamber. And respondent denies that E. C. S. was, at any time after the 25th of March, ignorant that any ceremony of marriage had taken place on the evening of that day, and that she was first informed thereof some days afterwards by respondent. He also denies that she ever denied to him that any ceremony of marriage had taken place between them, or expressed any indignation at his conduct: he also denies that she felt assured that it would not be considered as a valid marriage, and would hold no further communication with him, or that she expressed herself to that effect; but he says that some time after the marriage came to Mrs. Kelly's knowledge, and in consequence of her representation, E. C. S. inquired of respondent whether the marriage was valid, and respondent assured her that it was, and she was satisfied."

The King's advocate and Lushington in objection to the answers. The answer on the third article is not sufficient. Answers should be made available as evidence; if [150] they are not so framed, it would be better to avoid the expense and to waive them altogether: these answers seem framed with a view expressly to defeat all information. If a fact be within the respondent's knowledge, he must answer directly to it; if he has not an actual knowledge of the fact, then he is bound to answer as to his belief or disbelief. There may be exceptions to this rule, as where the answer would subject the respondent criminally, and perhaps some other exceptions, but these considerations do not now apply. In this case a marriage is pleaded in the libel to have been solemnized at Rome; that all the formal requisites were attended to, and that the marriage is valid. On the other hand, it is alleged that, if the abjuration of the parties were not bonâ fide, the marriage would be invalid, unless contracted by parties of the Roman Catholic Church. Our case is that the marriage is null and void from collusive fraud on the marriage-laws of Rome. The gist of the question depends on the abjuration being on both sides sincere: Swift, in his answer to the third article, avoids the plea on this point: as to Miss Kelly's abjuration of the Protestant religion, whether true and bonâ fide, he says "he knows not to answer:" this is invariably objectionable: of what use to the other party or to the Court is such an answer? It is resorted to for the purpose of evasion. The party is bound to answer to his belief or disbelief. Next, as to Swift himself, "he submits to the law, &c. that he is not bound to answer." By what law is he to ask for protection? If he has committed an offence in respect to his marriage, it is against the laws of Rome, and he ought to have so stated. He declines to answer as to himself, first, whether [151] he became a bonâ-fide member of the Church of Rome; secondly, whether he is or is not still a member of the Church of England.

The answer to the latter part of the fourth article, and to the fifth, are irrelevant and redundant. The matter thrown in is not requisite for the purpose of explanation, but to prevent those answers being read by us unless we make evidence against ourselves. In Oliver and Tuke v. Heathcote (2 Add. 35-42) the principles applicable to answers are laid down: "Much of answers, perhaps usually the most stringent part, consists of matter which is not capable of being put in plea. All such matter, then, is admissible in answers, and yet is that to which the other party has no opportunity of cross-examining. How, for instance, could the motives by which these parties were actuated, as they insist in assenting to, or rather in not dissenting from, the purchase of this estate by the deceased, be put in plea? or, if put in plea, who was capable of deposing to them? But were the respondents bound to admit the fact without an accompanying statement of these motives?" That was a testamentary suit, but the same doctrine applies in a matrimonial suit. An explanatory and extra-articulate answer therefore is to be restricted to what cannot be in the knowledge of any one but the respondent: still he is not to go out of the plea to answer to averment of facts, which, if true, may be pleaded and proved by witnesses.(b)

[152] Phillimore and Dodson contrà. Two grounds of objection are taken; 1st, that the answers are defective; 2dly, that they are redundant. How can it be expected, when the statements on the libel and on the allegation as to the validity of the marriage in question are so opposite that the answers on that point will alone suffice? Mr. Swift is required, by the argument on the other side, to answer as to the abjuration of his wife being bonâ fide: but how can his conscience be so taxed? He cannot answer expressly as to the motives of another party. Again, as to himself: if his answer were framed in the manner argued that it should be, it might impute perjury to himself: and supposing that he could not be punished in this country for such perjury, yet his character would be ruined; and at Rome at least it seems admitted that he might be punished. Any fuller answer as to himself would lead into an inquiry of his religious creed. But the law of England constrains no man to accuse himself: the great principle is, "nemo tenetur se ipsum accusare." And no human tribunal is entitled to ask a man whether bonâ fide he is of this or that religion; it is a question between God and himself: such a question was never pressed, even by the Court of Star-Chamber. The objection on the ground of redundancy cannot, we submit, be sustained; consummation is part of the res gestæ establishing her cognizance of an actual marriage.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. The present question relates to objections taken to the answers of Mr. Swift in a cause instituted by him for restitution of conjugal [153] rights. On the part of the alleged wife—a minor at the commencement of the suit—acting by her guardian, it has been pleaded that the asserted marriage not being conformable to the laws of Rome, where it was celebrated, is null and void. The cause therefore has assumed the shape of a suit of nullity of marriage.

In 1829 the parties, viz. Miss Kelly, then about nineteen, with her mother, and Mr. Swift and his mother, met at the same hotel in Florence. Mr. Swift paid attentions to Miss Kelly, which were not altogether rejected: he was permitted to apply to the mother, but she refused her consent. The two families removed to Rome; and it is alleged by Swift that a secret marriage there took place; and the validity of this asserted marriage at Rome is the question at issue. The wife denies her consent to any fact of marriage; but an attachment, a willingness on her part to be united to Swift, cannot be denied, because she was ready to sign a promise to marry him on her coming of age. Consummation is strongly alleged in the libel, but it is also strongly denied by the other party.

In order to obtain a valid marriage at Rome it is necessary that there should be a solemn renunciation of the Protestant religion, and that both parties should confess themselves to have become Roman Catholics, and that certain other ceremonies should be gone through. This is the husband's statement; and the wife pleads that such renunciation must be bonâ fide, but that in the present case it was only colourable and formal, was therefore of no avail, and could not confer any validity on this pretended marriage. Is then Swift bound to answer whether the renunciation and all the circumstances accompanying it were bonâ fide on his part and on the part of the lady?

(b) The objection taken to the answer upon the 11th article corresponded with the objection to the third article, and it was admitted would be entirely governed by the decision upon the third answer.

[154] The Court must recollect that by the common law of England no party is bound to furnish evidence against himself. In the Ecclesiastical Court and in the Courts of Equity, however, a party is bound to answer under some limitations: but I apprehend that neither the Ecclesiastical Court nor the Courts of Equity would be disposed to carry answers further than precedents sanction: and I can find no precedent compelling a party to answer as to secret intention and meaning: he is bound only to answer as to facts. In this case Swift does aver that all the requisite forms and ceremonies were gone through. Must it not be presumed that they were gone through bonâ fide? The bonâ fides is to be inferred and deduced from the facts themselves. It has been held that a party is not bound to answer so as to criminate himself, however remotely, so as even to form a link in a chain of proof. This is the doctrine of these Courts in criminal suits; and in a civil suit, as, for instance, in a suit for separation by reason of adultery a party is not bound to answer those articles which involve an express or implied charge of criminality.(a) And this is the doctrine of the Court of Chancery, with respect to witnesses: it was so held there in Paxton v. Douglas (19 Ves. 225), in which Lord Chancellor Eldon expressly states that he had looked into all the cases on the point. The decision in that case shews that a witness is not bound to criminate himself; à fortiori, a party is not bound to answer where a witness is not: and my impression is that a party is entitled to protection, not [155] only if the answer may tend to criminate, but even to degrade, him. I cannot, then, think that in this or any other Court Mr. Swift can be called upon to answer what were his meaning and intention, in his own private conscience, and what was passing in his mind upon the occasion of these forms: the answers must be to the facts, and upon these the Court will have to draw its own conclusion.

Suppose a party abjures Catholicism as a qualification for an appointment, can you enquire further than whether the forms prescribed by law have been observed? The party could not, I apprehend, be afterwards called upon under any proceeding to state upon oath whether his abjuration was bonâ fide—whether he was not still a Catholic? If Mr. Swift were to admit a mental reservation in the solemn acts connected with this marriage it would be to accuse himself of a fraud, nay, almost of perjury. Would not such an admission expose him to punishment? At least, if afterwards he should ever shew himself at Rome, it may be doubtful whether his person would be very safe: and in England such an admission would certainly, and at all events, tend to degrade him. I cannot then compel Mr. Swift to answer to his meaning and intention: nor can I oblige him to answer as to his belief of the mental intention of Miss Kelly: he is bound to answer as to his belief—but of what? of facts, not as to what was passing in the mind of another person.

In respect to the objection to the answer on the fourth article, I was inclined, at the first view, to think that the answer was redundant: but upon further consideration of the latter part of that article, and also of what is pleaded in the fifth [156] article of the wife's allegation, I have arrived at a different conclusion, and my opinion is that it is open to the husband, in denial of her allegation, to state in his answers, as the ground of such denial, conduct at the time inconsistent with what she now alleges, inter alia, that the marriage was consummated, and that he was constantly admitted to her bed, though clandestinely, both before and after the alleged communication to the mother—Mrs. Kelly—and until the intercourse was stopped: the statement in his answers is his causa scientiæ, and that on which his disbelief of the averment in the allegation is founded.

The objection to the eleventh article is of the same character as to the third; and is therefore disposed of. On the whole, I am of opinion that the answers are neither deficient nor redundant.

(a) See Schultes v. Hodgson, 1 Add. 111. Durant v. Durant, ibid. 114.

THE BISHOP OF ELY v. GIBBONS AND GOODY. Arches Court, Hilary Term, By-Day, 1833.—Upon an application for a prohibition propter defectum triationis, the Court of Arches had been enjoined from proceeding as to a custom till an issue was tried, the record of the judgment setting forth a verdict finding a custom for the parishioners to repair the chancel is conclusive evidence in the Ecclesiastical Court of the existence and validity of the custom.

[Referred to, Morley v. Leacroft, [1896] P. 93; Winstanley v. North Manchester Overseers, [1910] A. C. 10.]

On appeal from Norwich.

This suit commenced in the Episcopal Consistorial Court of Norwich, and was originally a business of the office of the Judge promoted by the churchwardens of Clare, Suffolk, against the Bishop of Ely, impropriator of a portion of rectorial or great tithes of that parish, for not repairing the chancel of Clare church.

Articles on the part of the promoters were admitted.

The bishop, in his answers to these articles, admitted that by law parsons or rectors of pa-[157]-rishes are bound to sustain the chancels of their parish churches, save as to exemptions by special composition, custom, or otherwise. He also admitted that, among the hereditaments, &c. of which, as appertaining to the Bishop of Ely, he was in possession, was a portion of tithes arising within Clare parish: that such portion heretofore belonged to, and was from time immemorial (as he believed) in the possession of, the dissolved religious house of St. John the Baptist at Stoke near Clare; that it became vested in the Crown, and was granted by 42 Eliz. to the see of Ely.(a)[1]

An allegation on behalf of the Bishop of Ely was afterwards admitted, which—after setting forth that neither the Bishops of Ely nor their lessees had ever exercised any right in, or enjoyed any advantage from, the chancel, either in respect of pews, burials, or monuments;(b) and that the benefits therefrom had always been enjoyed by the vicar and churchwardens of the parish—pleaded, that "from time immemorial the chancel had always been repaired by the churchwardens out of certain rents, or by means of rates equally levied on the parishioners for the repairs of the church including the chancel, to which rates the lessees of the portion of tithes, appertaining to the see of Ely within Clare parish, [158] were assessed, and had paid, in respect of such tithes, in common with the other parishioners; and that in no instance, except the present, had any proprietor or his lessee of such portion of tithes been called upon to repair the chancel."

The answers of the churchwardens to this allegation were objected to; and being pronounced sufficient, that decree was, on appeal, reversed by the Court of Arches, and the cause retained. Further answers were given in, and evidence was taken on both sides, and the cause was set down for hearing.

On the second session of Hilary Term (28th of January), 1831, the registrar of the Court of Arches alleged that he had been served with an order from the Court of Common Pleas, setting forth that a rule nisi had been granted to shew cause why a prohibition should not issue to prohibit the further proceedings in the Court of Arches, and enjoining it to stay proceedings in the mean time.

This rule for a prohibition nisi, generally, was obtained at the instance of the churchwardens. On the 15th of April the rule was made absolute.

On the 3rd Session of Trinity Term (12th of June), 1832, the registrar of the Arches alleged that the writ of prohibition had been amended by limiting the prohibition to the trial of the custom.(a)[2]

On the 1st Session of Michaelmas Term, 1832, the Court, upon the application of the proctor for the churchwardens, directed the hearing of the [159] cause to be suspended until the question of the custom had been tried.

(a)[1] From that period to the present the see of Ely had granted leases of such portion of tithes at the reserved rent of 10l. These leases had been generally renewed about every seven years upon payment of a fine.

(b) The respective rights of the impropriator, the vicar, and the parishioners in, and the authority of the ordinary over, these matters in the chancel were much considered in the case of Rich v. Bushnell, which is printed below, vide p. 164.

(a)[2] This amended rule was obtained at the instance of the churchwardens on their payment of the defendant's costs.

On the 8th of January, 1833, the trial came on before Lord Chief Justice Tindal and a special jury, when a verdict was given—that in the parish of Clare there is and hath been from time immemorial a certain ancient and laudable custom for the parishioners to repair the chancel. Judgment was signed on the 30th of January: and the churchwardens were condemned in the costs attending the application for the writ of prohibition.

On the 4th Session of Hilary Term an office copy of the judgment was brought into the registry of the Court of Arches; and on the by-day the cause stood for hearing.

After the pleadings had been opened the Court said: there is in this case a decision at law that from time immemorial the parish of Clare has repaired the chancel of its own parish church.

Phillimore and Lushington for the churchwardens. The jury have decided on the fact, not on the law; and the question now is whether their finding can exonerate the impropriator of the great tithes or his lessee from the repair of the chancel, which is imposed upon them by the general law. The question of the legality of such a custom is most important, and belongs to this Court.

Per Curiam. A custom, which is found by a jury to be imme-[160]-morial, will here be considered valid: a composition or agreement will be presumed.

Argument resumed. The mere existence of the fact, that there is a particular custom, is not sufficient to establish the validity of the custom. Many customs, or rather usages—for the word custom implies the notion of legal validity—may prevail which are not legal: e.g. that tithes shall be assessed to the church-rate, instances of which seem to have occurred in this parish of Clare: but however ancient such an usage may be, we apprehend that it cannot be sustained, whether the parsonage and tithes be in lay or spiritual hands. The whole of the parsonage, be the possession in whomsoever it may, is subject to the repairs of the chancel: all persons who are in the reception of the rectorial tithes are liable in this respect: their relative proportions may be settled among the parties. If the fabric of the chancel be very solid it may not require repair within the memory of man: but though there is an absence of proof that the person, who is de facto liable to repair the chancel, has ever been called upon to repair it, that will not exonerate him; his liability to make the repairs when they are required will still remain.

Per Curiam. The finding of the jury is that the parishioners have repaired the chancel from time immemorial: whereas the argument goes on the assumption that no repairs have been done. If that had been the case, the jury could not have found that the parishioners repaired: and the general law would take place.

[161] Argument resumed. Where it is shewn that the chancel has been repaired by the parishioners at large out of a church-rate, they may have taken a burthen upon themselves which seems to admit a liability, but it is different where the repairs have been paid for out of a church estate. We know of no authority, nor of any instance, where the parishioners are bound to repair the chancel, except in London: but in London the custom arose from the land in the different parishes being covered with houses, whence also grew that other custom prevailing in this city—that of the appointment of both churchwardens by the parishioners. Ignorance may often lead parishioners to repair the chancel; but that will not bind them when better informed. 1 Burn, Ecc. Law, tit. Church, s. 6 (Repairs). Prideaux, p. 74. Gibson, vol. 1, p. 199. Lyndw. p. 53. Williams v. Bond (2 Vent. 238), Pence v. Prowse (1 Ld. Ray. 59), Hawkins' case (5 Mod. 390).

Per Curiam. The general impression in Hawkins' case seems that the parishioners may be bound to repair. Is there any case where it has been held that a custom for the parishioners to repair the chancel is illegal?

Dr. Lushington. None that I am aware of. Hawkins' case must be taken with reference to all its circumstances. We submit that there is no authority by which it can be held that great tithes are exempted from a portion of liability in the repairs of the chancel.

[162] The King's advocate and Addams for the Bishop of Ely. We are surprised to find the case argued, the hearing of the cause having been suspended by a prohibition on the other side. The fact that there is "a good and laudable custom" for the parishioners of Clare to repair the chancel is now established by a verdict. How can this Court take the question into consideration? We admit that, generally, the lessee of the great tithes is bound to keep the chancel in repair; but there may be a special exemption: and when a custom exists for the parishioners to sustain the chancel, they may be compelled so to do. It is however said that a custom may have existed, and yet be invalid; and this perhaps may be so in a case of very gross manifest invalidity. Hawkins' case has been remarked upon by the Court: the other cases do not affect the question.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. This was originally a suit by the churchwardens of Clare, in the diocese of Norwich, against the Bishop of Ely, as impropriator of a portion of the great tithes, to compel him to repair the chancel. The bishop in defence pleaded that he never had repaired the chancel, that he had no enjoyment of it, nor emolument from it, either as to seats, or burials, or monuments; but that the rights in respect thereof had always been exercised by the vicar and churchwardens of the parish, and that from time immemorial the parishioners had by custom repaired the chancel. To try this latter defence the churchwardens moved for a prohi-[163]-bition, which accordingly issued to this Court; the question of custom has been tried in the Court of Common Pleas, and a verdict given that the parish is bound to repair the chancel: this verdict is accompanied with costs. In trying the question of custom at common law it was open to the churchwardens, I apprehend, to shew that there was no such custom, but that the expense of the repairs, as they were wanted, had been defrayed out of the rents of estates vested in the churchwardens for such a purpose. However that may have been, the finding of the jury is in general terms, and in favour of the defendant, the Bishop of Ely.

This seems to me quite decisive of the question. It is not open to this Court now to investigate the custom whether it be legal or not. The finding of the jury in this case sets the matter at rest; and so I think it must have been considered, because on the part of the parish the proceedings here have stood over from time to time until the result at common law should be ascertained: and upon the verdict being given it certainly was the expectation of this Court that the churchwardens would have proceeded no further in the suit. Whatever then may be the general law and primâ facie presumption in regard to the repairs of a chancel, still they are liable to be controlled by special custom: and I can see no reason why such a custom, as has been found, should not exist in Clare parish: in London such a custom exists generally: that indeed may be on peculiar grounds; but the inference from the authorities upon the point is that such a custom may also exist in country parishes. It turns out then that these [164] proceedings have been an attempt of the parishioners of Clare to throw a burthen from themselves upon the impropriator; and they prove to have been unfounded Under these circumstances, I am of opinion that the impropriator is entitled to be dismissed with his costs both in this Court and in the Episcopal Court of Norwich.

RICH v. BUSHNELL, Clerk.(a) Trinity Term, 4th Session, 1827.—The lay rector is not entitled as of right to make a vault or affix tablets in the chancel without leave of the ordinary, nor is he entitled to a faculty for such purposes without laying before the ordinary such particulars as will afford the vicar and parishioners an opportunity of judging of it, and satisfy the ordinary that such vaults or tablets will not interrupt the parishioners in the use and enjoyment of the chancel: nor has the vicar an absolute veto, though he may shew cause against the grant of a faculty. Semble, that the consent of the lay rector must precede the leave of the ordinary for the construction of a vault or the erection of tablets in the chancel.

[Referred to, Rugg v. Kingsmill, 1867, L. R. 1 Adm. & Ecc. 347; Winstanley v. North Manchester Overseers, [1910] A. C. 10.]

The present case came before the Court by letters of request from the Chancellor of Sarum, under which a decree with intimation issued, "calling upon the vicar, churchwardens, parishioners and inhabitants of the parish of Beenham, in the county of Berks, to shew cause why a faculty should not be granted to Sir Charles Rich, Baronet, lay rector of Beenham and sole owner and proprietor of the chancel of the parish church thereof, to make a vault for burials in the chancel for himself and his family, and to erect tablets against the wall to the memory of himself and of his family."

An appearance was given for the Reverend John Bushnell, the vicar; and an act on petition entered into, wherein it was alleged, on his behalf, that he was patron and incumbent of Beenham, possessed the glebe land and tithes of beans, hay, &c.; that he had a pew in the chancel which he repaired; that no one can be buried, or affix a [165] tablet, in the church without his leave, and for which he is entitled to a fee.

(a) See the preceding case, p. 157, in notis.

The act on petition is more fully stated in the judgment: and the question raised in this case was discussed upon the law applicable to the facts laid in the act on petition. There was no affidavit, nor exhibit on either side.

Arnold and Addams for the vicar. No one can properly be buried in any part of the church without the leave of the incumbent, Gibson, 453. "Which right of giving leave (says Gibson) will appear to belong to the parson, not as having the freehold, at least not in that respect alone, but in his general capacity of incumbent, and as the person whom the ecclesiastical laws appointed to judge of the fitness or unfitness of this or that person, to have the favour of being buried in the church." On these grounds it is contended that the leave of the incumbent is necessary, and that the right to consent, when the rector is a lay impropriator, resides in the vicar: for the common-law notion, that the right must belong to him in whom is the freehold, is incorrect, and would prove too much; since, as the freehold of the church-yard is in the rector, his right would apply also to burials in the church-yard, whereas the right of the parishioners to burial in the church-yard is notorious. The right, then, of consent depends not on the freehold, but belongs to the incumbent, be he rector or vicar, in his character and capacity of incumbent—the person who has the general superintendence of all divine offices, and the judge of the fitness and propriety of what is done both in church and chancel. The rector's property in the chancel is much qualified, [166] is subject to the use of the vicar and parishioners, and to the discretion of the ordinary as to the offices to be performed therein; the vicar has a pew, which he repairs, possibly in right of the tithes (ordinarily rectorial) with which he is endowed. But the question of property does not affect the matter; we rest the vicar's case on the principle that he is the judge of the fitness of interments. If his consent be necessary to a single interment, à fortiori to this faculty which provides for numerous interments.

As to the tablets, it is clear that the ordinary's leave is necessary, and we contend that the consent of the incumbent is a preliminary requisite: he is the best judge of what would occasion deformity or injury to the fabric, or hindrance to himself or the parishioners in the performance of divine offices: and, further, the faculty should not be a general permission to erect such tablets for all persons buried in the vault, but should be limited to a particular tablet; as to which the vicar and ordinary might exercise a sound discretion in granting or refusing their consent and sanction, on a statement setting forth the situation and dimensions of each.

Per Curiam. The application is for tablets, not monuments.

Argument resumed. The vicar is entitled to a fee for his consent, and may stand on his own price—Dean and Chapter of Exeter's case (Salkeld, 334. 1 Burn, tit. Burial, p. 273). Maidman v. Malpas (1 Hagg. Con. 208). The vicar, then, is entitled to a reasonable fee.

[167] Per Curiam. Who is to be the judge of the reasonableness of the fee, for here it is not claimed as a custom?

Argument resumed. The ordinary is guided by the usage in neighbouring parishes.

Jenner and Lushington for the impropriator. Is the vicar such an incumbent as is intended by Gibson? A vicar is only entitled to what the endowment may give: he has a qualified species of freehold in the body of the church and in the church-yard, but the perpetual curate has not; and the vicar stands in the same relation to the chancel that the perpetual curate does to the body of the church or church-yard. There are no direct or satisfactory authorities as to whether the consent of the lay rector, or of the spiritual person having the cure of souls, is the consent required for such erections in a chancel. The present question is not whether the lay rector can give consent to other parishioners and take a fee, but whether he is entitled to a faculty for himself and family. It has been contended that the consent of the vicar, as incumbent, is necessary; but he does not contribute to the repair of the chancel: as possessor of a pew, if his rights are interfered with, he is entitled to object, but here his general rights only are said to be infringed. The real ground of opposition is the non-payment of the fees: he must shew a fee is due. Maidman v. Malpas went on that principle.

In Littlewood v. Williams (6 Taunt. 277) it was held that no fees were due to churchwardens unless upon immemorial custom, a case which [168] it is almost impossible to meet with or to prove. If the fee is not established by custom, the vicar cannot sue for it here; and even if it were, it is doubtful whether he could.

It cannot be said that this faculty would be injurious to the parishioners, for the repairs are on the impropriator: he, then, is the best judge of the fitness of burials and tablets therein, and the freehold is in him. In Francis v. Ley (Cro. Jac. 367) it was held that the law gave the right of consent to the parson, because the freehold and soil are in him.

Per Curiam. Whether the ordinary can grant a faculty in respect of the chancel without the consent of the lay rector is one question; but whether the lay rector can make a vault in it or put up a tablet without the sanction of the ordinary (and that, according to the rejoinder in the Act, seems to be the claim here) is another question.

Argument resumed. The case of Francis v. Ley has been commented upon by Prideaux (Prideaux on Churchwardens, p. 78), who ascribes the power of granting leave to be in virtue of the freehold. But we do not entirely rely on that case: we admit the expression is too wide, for the rights of the owner of the soil are subject to the discretion of the ordinary, and very properly, since the lessees of the great tithes, who are often mere farmers, are in fact the rectors, and require the control of the ordinary. But it is clear that neither the ordinary nor the vicar could authorise burials in the chancel without the leave of the lay rector. If the vicar is entitled to a fee, [169] the grant of the faculty would not preclude his demand for it.

Per Curiam. And possibly if his consent to interments in a vault in the chancel were necessary he might refuse it till his fees were paid.

Argument resumed. The vicar is not entitled to a fee for the erection of tablets: his consent may be dispensed with. The ordinary is the first judge on such occasions, and will grant the permission if the consent is improperly withheld. 1 Burn, tit. Church, p. 372-3.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. The act on petition alleges, on the part of Sir Charles Rich, "that he is lay rector, and as such sole owner and proprietor of the chancel, and bound to repair the same;" and he has cited the vicar and others to shew cause "why a faculty should not be granted to him to make a vault for burials, and to erect tablets in the chancel, for himself and his family." No plans, no statement of the dimensions, nor of any particulars are exhibited: nothing to shew the extent of the vaults or tablets, or the manner in which they are to be erected.

On the other hand it is alleged, on the part of the vicar, "that he is patron and incumbent of Beenham; that the benefice is a vicarage; that he possesses the glebe land and tithes of beans, peas, vetches and hay; that Sir Charles Rich is not sole owner of the chancel, but that, as vicar, he (Rev. J. Bushnell) possesses a pew in the chancel which he is bound to repair; and that the chancel is small." He does not deny that Sir [170] Charles Rich is the lay rector, and bound to repair, nor does he suggest that, as vicar, and as proprietor of part of the tithes, he contributes in any degree to these repairs. He further alleges "that no person can be buried in the church or in any part thereof [it is not very clear whether he means to include the chancel] without the consent of the incumbent, and that the vault for which a faculty is prayed ought not to be made without the consent of the incumbent;" and, further, "that tablets ought not to be affixed in the church [under which term, I presume, he means to include the chancel] without consent of the incumbent; who is to judge in each particular case whether it will occasion inconvenience or deformity, or be otherwise improper:" and he finally submits that "for his consent he is entitled to a reasonable payment." For Sir Charles Rich it is replied "that, being the lay rector, he is the sole proprietor of the chancel, and entitled to the faculty."

These are the sole grounds stated on either side. One asserts that he has a right to the faculty; the other, that he has a right to refuse his consent; and if he consents has a right to a reasonable payment for such consent. The question then is which, or whether either, party has the right; or whether there are not two other parties, namely, the parish and the ordinary, whose rights are concerned.

Though the freehold of the chancel may be in the rector, lay or spiritual, as by a sort of legal fiction the freehold of the church is in the incumbent, and though the burthen of repairing the chancel may rest on such rector, yet the use of it belongs to the parishioners for the decent and convenient celebration of the holy communion, [171] and the solemnization of marriage; and, by the rubric, that portion of the communion service, which forms a part of the regular morning service, is directed to be read from the communion table which is appointed to stand in the body of the church, or in the chancel.(a) If, indeed, the churchwardens and inhabitants have no right nor interest in the question, why are they cited?

In the next place, the consent of the ordinary is necessary; he is the protector of the rights not only of the existing parishioners, but of succeeding inhabitants, and is bound to take care that neither their present nor their future convenience and accommodation are unduly prejudiced. If the rector is the sole proprietor and has this absolute right, why does he apply for a faculty at all? I am therefore of opinion that the lay rector is not entitled as a matter of right either to make a vault under, or affix tablets on the walls of, the chancel: and if the ordinary is to exercise any discretion upon the grant with a view to the protection of the convenience of the parish, that discretion cannot be soundly exercised without a plan, dimensions, and particulars on which the Court can form a correct judgment. A vault for burying in the chancel is altogether objectionable, though in many parishes such a practice has too much prevailed. Burying in the church or chancel, particularly where they are small, is inconvenient and offensive: it is an interference with the use of the building, is happily getting much out of use, and ought to be discouraged. In this very case it may interfere with the convenient occupation of the vicar's pew.

[172] Whether the faculty ought to be granted at all may be very doubtful; but at present no particulars are stated to warrant such grant, or to enable the Court to form any judgment on its propriety or expediency. In other respects, the application coming from the owner of the freehold undoubtedly comes in as favourable a shape as possible; unless indeed the vicar can convince the Court that his consent must precede the leave of the ordinary. If any other parishioner wanted to make a vault in the chancel the consent of the lay rector must be had; he must be called before the Court not merely because the freehold is in him, but because the burthen of repair is upon him.

The fixing a tablet against the wall is far less objectionable; and indeed is rather to be favoured. The necessity for the leave of the ordinary is admitted; and consequently plans and dimensions must be submitted to guide his judgment. That the vicar is entitled to shew cause against such leave being granted, if he shall so be advised, is also admitted. But what cause does the vicar shew against the faculty that is prayed? He does not object to the tablet as inconvenient to the parishioners, or as injurious to the fabric, or even detrimental to its beauty; but he states that he is the sole judge of that, and that his consent is to be purchased by a reasonable payment. It may be doubtful whether the consent of the vicar is necessary to the construction of a vault, or to the affixing of a tablet even in the body of the church, or whether he has in such a case a claim to a fee unless when established by a special custom; but that is not the question here: here, the question relates solely to the chancel. Even if the consent of the vicar to the actual interment of bodies were [173] required, or his right to a fee in such case were conceded, it would not necessarily follow that a faculty for the construction of a vault, or the erection of a tablet in the chancel, must be refused unless he consented to the grant. The grant of the faculty would not preclude the vicar from enforcing his fees if he were legally entitled to them.

That it belongs to the vicar of common right arbitrarily to consent or dissent in such cases seems to me extremely questionable. It is difficult to find out any principle upon which this right could appertain to him. The opinion of the vicar against the expediency of such a grant would have its due weight with the ordinary; but if the cause shewn by him be not something better than his mere will and pleasure, it will be insufficient to stay the issuing of the faculty: still more so, if his consent be matter of purchase and barter. If, as is stated in the act on petition, "he is to judge in each particular case whether it will occasion inconvenience or deformity, or be otherwise improper," that judgment must be formed, not "by a reasonable payment," but without money and without price. If the vault were allowed to be constructed and the vicar's consent to interments therein were necessary, he might object on proper grounds, such as that the party were not fidelis; but it cannot be tolerated that his decision, on the moral fitness of the individual to be buried in the chancel, should be guided by the amount of the fee paid. This strange notion of payment for consent seems to spread, and to meet with no unwilling assent in some quarters, whereas no fee of the kind is due of common right; it can only be due by special [174] custom, and the amount must be limited by the same custom. If such a custom could have a reasonable foundation it must at least be strictly proved, and this Court would not carry it one step beyond such proof; the introduction of such a practice would be most dangerous: and it would require very strong authority, much stronger than any I have heard cited in this case, to satisfy me that the vicar could, by custom, possess a right of refusing his consent to an interment in the chancel, à fortiori, to the grant of a faculty for a vault or a tablet, unless not a fixed but a reasonable fee is agreed to be paid.

(a) By the rubric before the present Common Prayer Book, the morning and evening prayer shall be used in the accustomed place of the church, chapel, or chancel, except it shall otherwise be determined by the ordinary of the place.

Upon the whole, both parties seem to have mistaken their rights. The lay rector is not, on the ground that the chancel is repaired by him, entitled to a faculty without laying before the ordinary such particulars as will afford the vicar and parishioners an opportunity of judging of it, and as will satisfy the ordinary that what is proposed to be done may be carried into execution without interrupting the parishioners in the use and enjoyment of the chancel; in which case the Court would pay due attention to the application. On the other hand, the vicar has not a positive right of refusal, though he may very properly shew cause against the grant of the faculty by stating the grounds of his objection: but in this case he has not made out any legal ground of resistance.

Whether the parties choose to enter into the merits in order to shew that a faculty ought or ought not to be granted, is for their consideration. Vaults, either in the chancel or in the body of the church, are not, in my judgment, to be encouraged: they are far better made in the church-yard; yet, if all parties are consentient, the Court [175] may be induced to grant the faculty. Tablets, I repeat, stand on a much more favourable ground; and if shewn not to be injurious to the convenience, the beauty, and the stability of the fabric, a faculty for their construction would probably be granted. At present, however, no ground either for making or refusing such a grant having been shewn on either side, I shall refuse the faculty, and dismiss the case, without costs, unless the parties desire to proceed.

Faculty refused.

The cause was not further prosecuted. See Clifford v. Wicks, 1 Barn. and Ald. 498. Hopper v. Davis, 1 Ecclesiastical Cases temp. Sir George Lee, 640. Seager v. Bowle, 1 Addams, 541. Bardin and Edwards v. Calcott, 1 Hagg. Con. 14.

[176] BURTON v. COLLINGWOOD. Prerogative Court, Hilary Term, By-Day, 1832.—A will, written eighteen years before the testator's death, containing this passage, "Lest I should die before the next sun I make this my last will;" admitted to probate, the Court holding the disposition not contingent, and adherence shewn by careful preservation.

[Discussed, In the Goods of Spratt, [1897] P. 31.]

On admission of an allegation.

Thomas Burton died at Andover on the 19th of January, 1832, leaving Maria Burton, his only child, and William Collingwood, his grandson, together entitled in distribution, under an intestacy. His property was under 9000l. The daughter propounded the following paper:—

"March 5, 1814. Morning, near One.

"All men are mortal, and no one knows how soon his life may be required of him.

"Lest I should die before the next sun I make this my last will and testament, in thankfulness to God that I have any thing left to devise.

"I leave to Maria Burton, my daughter unmarried, 1000l. sterling, which she will as she thinks best, either lay out in an annuity, or live upon the interest of the principal.

"The sum of 448l. 15s. Navy five per cent. standing in my name, I bequeath in equal portions to my daughters-in-law, Alice Cape and Katherine Wingrave, and to my daughters, Margaret Collingwood, and Maria, unmarried; [177] provided always, that this distribution shall not be made until the death of Mrs. Wade, of Richmond, Yorkshire; and that the dividends due upon the said stock be paid half-yearly to Mrs. Wade, if she survive me, until the conclusion of the half-year preceding her death.

"Further I at present give no directions. "THOMAS BURTON."

The allegation, in support of this paper, pleaded "that it was written by the deceased himself; that Mrs. Wade died in November, 1814, and that the testator thereupon distributed the principal sum of 448l. 15s. Navy five per cents. among the several persons to whom the same stood bequeathed in reversion in his will. That after the death of Margaret Collingwood, in June, 1828, the testator often expressed himself as if his surviving daughter, Maria, who resided with him, would be entitled to and would take at his decease the whole of his property. It further pleaded the testator's death at the age of eighty-five, after a week's illness, during which his memory became exceedingly defective; that on the day before his death he told his daughter 'that he had not made his will, but that she would take as he intended the whole of his property, and that it would perhaps have been as well if he had put his intention into writing, though that was now too late;' that the testator did not thereby mean to depart from his said will as far as it would effect his intentions in favour of his said daughter, but that he had then entirely forgotten it: that the will was found carefully deposited and locked up in a drawer in his bed-room, in which drawer the testator kept his cash and papers of moment and concern."

[178] Dodson and Haggard opposed the allegation, on the grounds that the paper propounded was contingent and conditional, and that the circumstances pleaded were not sufficient to entitle it to probate.

Addams and Matcham contrà.

Per Curiam (Sir John Nicholl). The Court, being of opinion that the will was not contingent as to the disposition of the property,(a) and that the careful manner in which it had been preserved manifested such an adherence to it that it was entitled, valeat quantum, to probate, admitted the allegation.

The allegation being admitted, no further opposition was offered.

[179] IN THE GOODS OF THE REV. B. J. WARD. Prerogative Court, Easter Term, 1st Session, 1832.—An unattested letter purporting to dispose of realty and personalty, and conditional on the deceased's dying during a visit to Ireland, not admitted to probate in common form (the parties prejudiced being minors), the deceased having returned from Ireland and having subsequently executed a will, attested by three witnesses, disposing of land (purporting to be bequeathed in the letter), appointed his wife executrix and guardian of his children, but not referring to the letter, nor to his personalty.

On motion.

The deceased, while at Liverpool with his brother William, on the 12th of March, 1831, in his way to Ireland to attend his father's funeral, wrote to his wife respecting several family concerns, and thus proceeded: "I mention these matters thus particularly to serve as a memorandum for you in case it should be the Lord's will to call me hence by any fatal event in the voyage or journey before us, and for the same reason will add the following of my worldly goods not directed in our marriage settlement: viz. I wish you to have the use of the 3500l. left out of the settlement, and of all my personal property of whatever nature which may happen to be in my own power to dispose of, likewise of an estate in land in the county of Wicklow, which I find my father has left me by his will. I wish that you should have the use of all this for your life; and that after your death the Wicklow estate, if not previously disposed of, should go to Robin, and the 3500l. should be for the benefit of our children in whatever proportions you may think right. William tells me that such a declaration of my wishes as the above with regard to my possessions, will have all the effect of a formal will and may possibly be of great utility and importance."

The deceased soon returned to England; and [180] by several interlineations exclusively in the early part of the letter, as to private matters, it was evident that the letter was under his consideration on the 19th of October. In January he was dangerously ill, and at his brother's suggestion he wrote as follows:—"I give and devise all my lands at Knockanode or elsewhere in the county of Wicklow in Ireland (a)[1] to my eldest son Robert Ward and his heirs; my dear wife having the use of it for the term of her natural life. Witness my hand and seal this 19th of January, 1832.

(a) See upon contingent wills, 1 Williams' Executors, pp. 92-3.

"B. J. WARD.

"I do likewise appoint my dear wife sole executrix of this my will and testament, and likewise sole guardian of my children. "B. J. WARD" (L.S.).

The above was attested by three witnesses; and endorsed by the deceased in pencil, "My will as to Knockanode, &c. Stanton, 19th of January, 1832."

The deceased, a few days afterwards, died, leaving his wife and four minor children, and a personalty under 5000l.

W. Ward, the brother, stated in affidavit that the testamentary part of the letter of the 12th of March was written at his suggestion, and was intended to operate as a will: and Mrs. Phillips, on affidavit, deposed (in substance) as follows:—"The deceased was taken ill about July: during his illness I mentioned to him that I had received a letter from his brother William, then in Ireland, advising that he (deceased) should dispose of his estate in Wicklow by will: that it should be at-[181]-tested by three witnesses, and that he should appoint a guardian of his children: the deceased replied 'he had done all that was necessary in a letter to his wife, which his brother had said would have the effect of a will.' I forbore to press it: but on the 19th of January renewed the subject, and the deceased wrote out the paper devising the Wicklow estate, and gave it to me to read: I told him he had omitted guardians or executors; he added them and then observed, 'I have purposely said nothing about personals, as I have done all that before in the letter, and it might make confusion.' I urged that it would be better if it were all written on the same paper, as it would be necessary to send the letter to be proved: he replied 'that he did not think that of any consequence.'"

The King's advocate moved for probate of the letter, and paper of the 19th of January, as together containing the will.

Per Curiam. The disposition, as contained in the letter, was written with the declared intention that it should operate only in case the deceased did not return from Ireland: (a)[2] he returned, and executed a paper duly attested to pass his real estate; and the alterations in the letter, in pencil, shew that he did not regard the disposition in it as final. The wife will, under the executed instrument, take the real estate for life. I cannot, however, to the prejudice of minor children, grant probate, in common form,(b) also of the letter on mere affidavits [182] as to the deceased's intention, though the eldest son may take a share of the personalty which apparently was not contemplated.

Probate of the letter rejected.

IN THE GOODS OF ALEXANDER JOHNSTON. Easter Term, 1st Session, 1832.—Administration of a domiciled Scotsman granted to an agent appointed, by the Court of Session, factor loco tutoris to the infant children.

On motion.

The deceased, a domiciled Scotsman, died at Edinburgh intestate and a widower; leaving property of various descriptions and large amount. The Court of Session, at the petition of two aunts (the only next of kin) of the children (infants) of the deceased, appointed his late agent to be factor loco tutoris to the infants.

Administration of the effects in England (upon a copy of the above petition and appointment being exhibited) was now prayed by Lushington to be granted to the agent.

Per Curiam. Let the grant pass.

Motion granted.

(a)[1] It was stated that the deceased had no other freehold.

(a)[2] See Burton v. Collingwood, supra, p. 176.

(b) The Court will on a proxy of consent grant probate of papers when the facts stated in affidavit would, if proved in solemn form of law and in a contested case, entitle the papers to probate: but in a case where minors are concerned, and where such proxy of consent cannot be given, the papers must be regularly propounded, and the witnesses be examined in solemn form.

[183] ELSDEN v. ELSDEN. Prerogative Court, Easter Term, 1st Session, 1832.—A testator, having executed his will disposing of realty and personalty and duly attested, subsequently wrote, signed, and dated a paper complete in disposition, but unattested, having the appearance of a draft, and spoken of in a memorandum subjoined, as intended to be settled and transcribed by his attorney, but "if he should have no opportunity, to be acted upon if it could be done fairly; if not, the former will to be resorted to;" the testator having the opportunity of completing such paper, which, if admitted to probate, would have been inoperative totally as to the realty, and partially as to the personalty, must be presumed to have abandoned it, and to have reverted to the regular will.(a)

On the admission of an allegation.

Edmund Elsden, Esq., died on the 12th of January, 1832, aged forty-three, at his house in Lynn, leaving a widow, two uncles—Henry Elsden, Esq., and Scarlett Everard, Esq.—and three aunts. His real estate was worth about 12,000l., and his personal about 25,000l.

On the 24th of July, 1824, the testator executed a will (marked A) duly attested to pass real estate, whereby he gave his freehold house in Lynn to his wife for life, and after her death to his uncle, Henry Elsden, his heirs, &c. He also gave all other his real estate to his said uncle and his heirs for ever. He gave the furniture and effects in his house to his wife absolutely, save the plate and books, which were, after her death, to go to his said uncle; he also gave to his wife 100l. and an annuity of 500l. secured by his said uncle's bond. This provision was to be in addition to what she was entitled under her marriage settlement, but in bar of dower. The residue he gave to his said uncle, and appointed him sole executor.

Paper B was headed: "Mr. H. E. is requested to present ten guineas each to the undermentioned friends in lieu of rings, with my best regards." [184] Then, after ten names, followed "100 guineas to Mrs. Henry Goldsmid, and twenty guineas to Simpson and R. Cook." This paper was also dated on the 24th of July, 1824: it was subscribed by his initials only and had no witnesses.

Paper C was to this effect—

"Out of my personal property I bequeath the following legacies free of duty:—

"An annuity of 25l. to Peter Fitt, if in my service at my decease.

"To all my domestic servants, 5l. each.

"To all the clerks in my service, each 19l. 19s.

"To the following persons, in lieu of rings, 19l. 19s. each."

Then followed nine names, six of which had been enumerated in B.

This paper was without date, signature, or initials; but as Mr. Simpson, a legatee of a ring in B, died in 1829, and his name was omitted in C, it was conjectured to have been written subsequently to the death of that legatee.

Paper D, the unexecuted will, began thus—

"This is the last will and testament of me, Edmund Elsden, of King's Lynn, in the county of Norfolk, made this twenty-second day of November, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and thirty-one. I give my messuages, lands, estates, &c. &c. in certain parishes, to Henry Elsden, Esquire, his heirs and assigns for ever. My freehold house at Lynn, in which I reside, to my wife, Isabella Elsden, for life; and after her death to Henry Elsden and his assigns, he and they keeping the same in good repair: my furniture, linen, china, wines, and all other articles in and about my dwelling-house (except my plate, prints, and printed books, as well as [185] Bank notes, money and securities for money, and such other things as I may hereafter except in an inventory attached to this my will) unto my wife for her own use and benefit: and I give my plate, prints, and printed books to my said wife for the term of her natural life; also 100l. All the real property (not before disposed of) that I may now or hereafter be in possession of, I desire to be retained, or sold and re-invested on other real security, or on mortgage of land, as may be deemed most advisable by my executors. My personal property not before disposed of to be invested on mortgage of land. The income arising from my real, and from the investment of my personal, property (after payment of debts, legacies, &c.) I desire may be paid to my wife during her life: and until my executors can satisfactorily invest my property, I give to my wife one annuity or clear yearly sum of five hundred pounds, payable quarterly. The provision made by this my will for my said wife is in bar of all dower or thirds of and in my real estate, but in addition to what she may be entitled by her marriage settlement. If my uncle, Henry Elsden, survives my wife, I desire the income may be paid to him during his life. After the decease of both I request the property may be transferred into the names of [the owners for the time being of four specified properties], and of the Mayor of Lynn, for the time being, as trustees; and, wishing to make my property conducive to the public good, I direct the trustees to dispose of the income in the purchase under, or at par, of the Lynn paving bonds." [The bonds were particularly specified; and minute directions given as to their cancellation, and the appropriation of the proceeds, together with [186] the income of his property. 2000l. worth of such bonds, first, in ease of the paving and water-rates in Lynn: in the erection of a public hospital at Lynn, its maintenance or enlargement, deducting 100l. per annum for the chaplain.]

(a) See Gillow and Orrell v. Bourne, infra, 192; and Tudor v. Tudor, infra, 199, in notis.

The will, after giving directions as to the governors of the hospital, proceeded: "The undergraduate of the University of Cambridge who shall compose, recite in the Senate House, print and publish the best English essay in support of the cause of public liberty and good government in the term immediately preceding commencement day, or on commencement day, shall be entitled, upon presentation to the trustees and governors of the hospital of a printed copy signed by the vice chancellor of the University, the public orator, and the professor of political economy, to receive a gold medal of the value of 50l., or 50l. in money." Then, after a similar provision for the University of Oxford, "subject to the payment of my just debts, &c. &c., I give the entire property I may die possessed of, real or personal, to the under-mentioned persons, for the uses and trusts previously recited in this my will, subject to such legacies as I may hereafter specify; and I also nominate and appoint the same as executrix and executors of this my will—viz. Mabella Elsden, Henry Elsden, Esq., of Congham, in the county of Norfolk, and Samuel Hinde, Esq., of Lancaster. To the latter a legacy of 100 guineas. Hereby revoking all former wills by me made, and declaring this only to be my last.

"In witness, &c. &c. "EDMUND ELSDEN.

"I intend to have this settled and transcribed [187] by an attorney as soon as convenient; should I unfortunately not have an opportunity, I should wish it to be acted upon, if it can be done fairly and according to the true meaning of the expressions; if not, my will of the 24th of July, 1824, must be resorted to.

"E. ELSDEN."

This instrument of the 22d of November, 1831, was unattested: it was written by the deceased on twelve sides of foolscap, bookwise, leaving corresponding blank sides: it was propounded on behalf of the widow.

The allegation pleaded the factum of the will of the 24th of July, 1824, and codicils; it also pleaded that on the 10th of October, 1831, the testator was taken ill; that he so far recovered as to leave Lynn on the 5th of November, where he returned on the 19th, after having paid, with his wife, visits to his uncle Elsden, to Mr. Pratt and Mr. Rolfe: it then, after pleading the factum of paper D on the 22d of November, alleged "that on the said day he was unable to leave his room from illness; that by the 15th of December he was convalescent; and on Monday, the 26th, he went with Mrs. Elsden on a visit about nine miles from Lynn, whither he returned on Saturday; that on the 4th of January, 1832, he drove a few miles into the country, when he caught a severe cold, by which he was confined to his bed on the following day, and continued to get worse till he died, on the 12th." It then pleaded declarations to his wife on or about the 22d of November "that he had been making his will; that he offered it to her to read; that he thought he [188] could not do better than leave his property to erect a hospital; that he would consider whether it should be on the plan of the Norwich hospital, shortly afterwards observing that he very much doubted whether he could so leave it, on account of the statute of mortmain; but that when he went to Norwich he would consult some professional man upon it. That the testator had for many years very much interested himself about the welfare of Lynn, and expressed a desire to benefit its inhabitants. That A, B, and C were found enclosed in an envelope, not sealed, but locked up in the deceased's desk; that D was also found there, but without an envelope."

Lushington and Haggard opposed the allegation. The paper of 1831 is clearly unfinished, and that by the deceased's own act; secondly, if it were admitted to probate no material object contemplated by the paper could be attained. It was principally intended to benefit the town of Lynn; but all the bequests for that purpose fail, because the personal estate is directed to be invested on mortgage of land, thus proposing to give a future interest in land upon trust for charitable purposes. The bequest for founding a hospital being void, the university exhibitions would seem also void, as the conditions in respect to them cannot be complied with. The deceased's intentions under this paper failing, the concluding sentence of the memorandum, at the end of the paper, amounts to a republication of his executed will.

The King's advocate and Dodson contrà. If it were not for the clause subjoined to the [189] will propounded, the other side would have no case. It is said that the latter will cannot operate as to one kind of the testator's property; but admitting that the testator was aware of the necessity of witnesses to pass his real estate, the question still is, whether the will of 1831 is not a good disposition of the personalty, and whether he did not contemplate its operation to that extent. The fact that he knew that the will, when he signed it, was not duly executed to convey his realty, primâ facie, may be considered as shewing that he fully proposed and was aware that it would take effect as to his personalty. The paper is not imperfect, the allusion in it to an inventory and to legacies, which are not supplied, is nothing more than the sort of saving clause frequently inserted as to codicils, which the testator, though he may not then intend to make, contemplates the possibility of making at some subsequent time.

Addams for the Mayor of Lynn, as one of the residuary legatees in trust under the will of 1831, and one of the parties cited. A Court of Probate, in looking at a conditional will, is not in the habit of tying a party down strictly: and what is the purport of the clause inserted at the foot of the will of 1831? When the testator used the language "should I unfortunately not have an opportunity," he meant "a convenient opportunity;" so when he added "my will of 1824 must be resorted to," he did not propose that that will should be substituted for his later will, but that the former should be resorted to for explanation. It is not clear that the purchase of the paving bonds, directed by the later will, would come within the statutes of mortmain.

[190] Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. The property in this case is considerable, the personalty being stated at 25,000l., and the real estate at 12,000l. If then I felt any difficulty on the case I should allow the allegation to go to proof; but I can entertain no doubt whatever upon it. The deceased in July, 1824, duly executed a will to pass real estate; he afterwards wrote two papers of a codicillary nature, the latter pleaded to have been written in 1829 or later. The first consideration is the appearance and character of the paper propounded: it is clearly unfinished, and can, I think, be regarded only as a draft for a future will: for though it is true that the instrument contains this clause—"hereby revoking all former wills by me made and declaring this only to be my last"—and then is added "in witness, &c., &c.," yet those expressions would equally be inserted in a draft, as in a will intended to operate. To my mind the paper is manifestly only temporary and deliberative, and it is quite inconsistent with the deceased's habits as a man of business, and with his prior existing will, that he should think this unexecuted draft would operate. Something further was intended, and was necessary to be done in order to carry his wishes into effect.

What, too, is the purport of the memorandum? That the paper was intended as a draft to be fairly transcribed, and that even if sudden death had interrupted the progress of the paper, and had deprived him of an opportunity of consulting his professional adviser, it was the deceased's wish that the former will should remain in force, unless the whole disposition contained in this unfinished instrument, both as to the realty and personalty, [191] could be carried into execution. So that even if completion had been clearly prevented by the act of God, still it would be difficult to establish the title of this paper to probate.

It is clear, however, that he had abundant opportunity to complete a new will, and no grounds are stated in the allegation to account for the delay. Though in a precarious state of health when the paper bears date, and prior to that time, he was sufficiently well to be absent from home on a visit to his friends, and to occupy himself in writing this paper consisting of several sheets, and embodying a new disposition of his property, and though he was unable from illness to leave his room on the 22nd of November, he subsequently, viz. before the 15th of December, became convalescent, went out on a visit for some days, again drove out into the country on the 4th of January when he caught cold, which on the following day confined him to his bed; and though he gradually grew worse till his death on the 12th, yet he makes no subsequent reference to this paper, expresses no anxiety about it, nor takes any steps to give it full and final effect. The law therefore regards the paper as deliberative, and presumes that the deceased had abandoned it, and reverted back to his executed will of 1824, which alone can act upon his real estate.(a)[1] I, therefore, reject the allegation; but considering that the papers were left by the deceased himself so as to make it necessary to bring them before the Court, I decree the costs of all parties out of the estate.

Allegation rejected. Costs out of estate.

[192] GILLOW AND ORRELL v. BOURNE. Prerogative Court, Hilary Term, 4th Session, 1831.—The deceased in 1812 regularly executed a will, and in 1818 two codicils, to carry real estate; he, in February, 1828, gave instructions for a new will disposing both of real and personal estate: the will was prepared for execution, read over to him and altered; the sheets altered, recopied, and the will again read over, after an interval of some days; the deceased postponed the execution, and in March the will was again read over to him; pencil alterations of slight importance were then made; on the 14th of November, 1829, further alterations were alluded to; the deceased said he would call and "finish" it on the 19th: he died suddenly on the 17th. The Court refused probate of this instrument, holding final intention not proved.

Thomas Westby died on the 17th of November, 1829, a bachelor, aged seventy, possessed of personal property valued at about 44,764l., and of real property valued at about 33,500l. His cousins, Thomas and Mary Westby, were alone entitled in distribution under an intestacy. Thomas Westby was also heir-at-law. The testamentary papers were, a will dated the 28th of January, 1812, with two codicils, dated respectively the 24th and 30th of November, 1818, all duly executed to pass real estate: and an unexecuted instrument (contained in twenty-three sheets of paper) dated 1828.(a)[2]

[193] To establish this unexecuted instrument, Gillow and Orrell, the executors named in it, pleaded the factum and due execution of the will of 1812, and codicils thereto; they then pleaded the intimacy of the deceased with, and his confidence in, his solicitors, Messrs. Pilkington of Preston; and that being very ill, he on the 23d of January, 1828, was attended by Mr. Richard Pilkington, to receive directions for his new will.

The remainder of the plea was to the effect of the following evidence:—

(a)[1] See Gillow and Orrell v. Bourne, infra, p. 192; and Tudor v. Tudor, infra, p. 199, in notis.

(a)[2] Comparative abstract of the chief parts of the paper propounded, dated 1828, and of the will of 1812, and codicils of 1818.

Will of 1812 and first Codicil of 1818.

 By the second codicil the testator devised certain lands, purchased subsequent to the making of his will, to the same uses as the lands devised by his will.

By will of 1812, the same, except that the power, in favour of a wife, was limited to 200l. per annum.

Same by codicil.....

By will of 1812, a rent charge of 500l. per annum, and, after his death, 250l. also charged on the real estate, to his wife.

——— Legacy of 200l.

By Codicil, 15l. per annum.

——— Same.....

By will, 3000l.....

——— To Worswick (dead) and Bourne, executors, 100l. each.

——— Same.....

Unexecuted Paper, dated 1828.

The testator, after devising his real estate in trust to the use of George Westby (eldest son of his cousin Thomas), for life, and then to his heirs with remainder, with a power to charge the estates with 250l. per annum to the wife of any heir, gave to—

Mary Westby an annuity of 50l.

Thomas Westby an annuity of 300l. and after his death to his wife.

Mary Latchford, 30l. per annum.

Mary Brotherton, 20l. per annum.

John Brotherton, 10l. per annum.

Edmund Westby, 5000l.

To his executors, Bourne, Gillow, and Orrell, 100l. each.

Richard Carus, 10 Guineas.

Mr. Richard Pilkington deposed: "I had been [194] intimate with the testator for thirty years: on the 23d of January, 1828, he was very ill; expressed his fears to me that he should not recover; said 'he had talked of making his will with me very often, but that now it must be done.' I was engaged with him, with intervals of rest, from about nine in the morning until four p.m. about the instructions; and when I took my leave he said 'he was anxious to have the matter completed as soon as possible;' but I told him it would occupy two or three days to prepare his will." The witness, after deposing to the preparation of the draft by Mr. Addison, a barrister at Preston, and to its engrossment for execution, then proceeded: "Early in February I took this engrossed copy to the deceased at Whitehall, twelve miles from Preston: I read the greater part to him, contenting myself with explaining to him the powers to grant [195] leases, and clauses of that description. He approved of the will generally, but some alterations were made by his suggestion and at his direction. The deceased's will was again settled by Mr. Addison; and the altered sheets being recopied, and the whole will made complete for execution, I again in February attended the deceased with it. I found him very considerably better. I read the will over to him as altered; I read the whole of it as before, explaining the technical and legal clauses, but reading the other parts word for word: it occupied a considerable time; for the deceased made his observations as I proceeded; it was the business of the whole day: he declared his approbation of the whole will, and said 'he was satisfied with it, and should call at my office when he came over to Preston, and execute it there.' I pressed him to execute it at the time, but he said, 'Why, you don't think I am going to die,' or something to that effect, and concluded by saying 'that he should be over at Preston very soon, and then he would do it;' meaning, as I understood and believe, that he would then execute it. Early in March, 1828, the testator came to my office, said he would dine and sleep at my private residence, and requested me when I came home to bring his will with me that we might talk it over together. After dinner I read and explained the whole thereof again to him; we talked it over again, and as we went over it I made some alterations at his request, and as I proposed to make these alterations afterwards in ink, and to have the sheets in which they occurred recopied, I did not then ask him to execute his will. After this I had many interviews and conversations with him on the subject of his will; [196] he used to talk of finishing it, but never appointed a time for so doing, and therefore I did not have

---

Will of 1812 and first Codicil of 1818.

——— 1000l. to each absolutely.

——— 100l. to Robert only.

By codicil, 500l. in like trust.

By will of 1812, the testator gave the residue of his personal estate, if any, to George Westby, absolutely.

Unexecuted Paper, dated 1828.

3000l. in trust for Mary Ann Westby and children; 3000l. on like trust, for Julia Westby. If no issue, &c. then to sink into the residue.(a) 1000l. in trust for children of Robert Moore.

800l. in trust for Mary Maudesley for life, then to her children.

The testator gave the residue of his personal estate in trust to his executors to pay therefrom the debts, funeral expences, charges of probate, and the legacies; and to invest the surplus in the purchase of land to be settled under the like limitations as his real estate; but subject, if his personal estate appropriated thereto be insufficient, to the discharge of his debts and legacies.

Power to trustees to advance and pay to tenant for life 5000l. towards building a house on the estate.

 On the paper of 1828 was endorsed, "Mr. Carus 100l. and a mourning ring. Mrs. Carus, his wife, 100l."

(a) In the margin, in pencil, was written, "If Mary Ann and Julia die unmarried to have power to dispose of the 3000l."

it completed for execution. I believe when he talked of finishing it he meant executing it, and nothing more; for no remark ever escaped him to give me reason to believe but that he adhered to the will as he had directed it to be altered. It never occurred to me that he had any idea of making any alteration in his will; it appeared to me that he had some apprehension that by executing his will he should hasten his death, and that he had not resolution to fix a day for executing it. No other reason ever occurred to me for his not executing it, or fixing a day for the purpose before he did so, which was on Saturday the 14th of November, 1829: on that day he called upon me at my office at Preston, and I had not seen him in apparently better health for some time before; he was passing through Preston on his return from Manchester, having been there to see Miss Westby, a legatee in his will: in allusion to her, he said 'she must be taken care of; that he would finish his will;' and then named Thursday, the 19th, as the day on which he would come to me for that purpose, and execute it at my office; he asked, 'Could it be completed on that day?' I told him 'it could; and that I would take care to have every thing ready for him:' he then replied that he would complete his will or finish it (meaning he would execute it) on that day." . . . "Before he left me he reminded me of the death of Mr. Carus, a legatee in his will, and that it must be altered in that respect: he was particular in asking me if it could be finished (meaning 'executed') on Thursday, if he came; and I told him 'if he wished it, it should be:' he replied, [197] 'Then it shall be finished before I return home.' This was the last time I saw him; and I am quite satisfied that he had then fully determined to execute the said will; and that he had before then fully made up his mind with respect to the said will, and had no intention of altering it. The testator was extremely parsimonious and reserved."

On interrogatory. "I cannot say how many conversations I had with the testator between March, 1828, and the 14th of November, 1829: they were so numerous. He had fully and completely made up his mind to execute the engrossment with the alterations requisite according to the pencilled minutes, and without any further alterations in any of the legacies; and he would actually have executed the will on the 19th, if it had not been for the intervention of his death. I considered my instructions complete, and that the deceased had made up his mind as to what should be the final disposition of his will: the expressions which he used to me on the 14th of November were spontaneous; it was his own appointment; he named his own day, Thursday, to finish his will. It was not in answer to any observation made by me that he expressed himself as he did. I do not believe that it was the testator's intention to give the annuity of 300l. to Thomas Westby, and after his death to his wife, in addition to the annuity (under the will of 1812) of 500l. to the said Thomas Westby, and 250l. to his wife if she survived her husband."

The second witness deposed to the testator's sudden death.

Mr. Bourne, the surviving executor under the will of 1812, denied, in his answers, that the deceased, by the expressions "he would finish it," [198] meant that he would execute the paper propounded on the 19th of November, 1829.

Gostling and Lushington for the unexecuted paper. The case turns upon the consideration of two questions: first, whether the deceased's mind was finally made up to execute the paper propounded; and, if the Court is satisfied of the affirmative of that position, then, secondly, whether the contents of the paper itself prevent a grant of probate. On the first point the proof is conclusive. Had the testator died on the night after the will, as revised, had been read over to and approved by him, a doubt as to his final intention could not have been raised. The deceased, however, procrastinated, and the paper being unexecuted, he made in it some alterations; they are of small and quite subordinate importance. Secondly, the general effect of the will of 1812 and its codicils is the same as of the unexecuted will. In both the real estate is strictly entailed. The chief variation is in the disposition of the residue. In the first will the testator did not contemplate a residue; in the latter, he directs it to be laid out in land, and gives it in trust in the same manner as an original fund. The two bequests to Thomas Westby may be said to conflict; but the latter is clearly a substitution, and Thomas Westby would be bound to make his election.

Per Curiam. Where probate is granted of two papers as together containing the will, then a legacy in the latter paper is in substitution: but in this case, should probate be granted of the later instrument, there will be one will for the real, another for the personal, property.

[199] Argument resumed. Where there is proof of intention that a paper should operate, a single difficulty ought not to supersede it. This Court is sometimes called a "Court of Intention," difficulties of construction form no ground for refusing probate; they belong to the Court of Chancery. In the recent case of Tudor v. Tudor (a) the later instrument was pronounced [200] against, because the personalty was mixed up and blended with the realty: here there is no objection of that sort. The personalty much exceeds in value the fee simple of the real estate: the debts and legacies are not charged on the real estate; and the personalty, after payment of all the demands upon it, will yield a considerable surplus. The execution was ultimately prevented by sudden death.

The King's advocate and Haggard contrà. First, the evidence disproves final intention, and on that ground alone the case must fail. The question is not between an unexecuted paper and intestacy, but between an unexecuted paper and a will and codicils executed to pass real estate: "Facilius testamentum sustinetur si aliud non præcedat quam si præcedat." Secondly, the later instrument purports to dispose of real and personal property; and can it be supposed or inferred that the testator would have wished, or that he intended, such instrument should take effect as to his personalty when his real estate would be governed by the will of 1812? The paper propounded was intended as a perfectly new disposition of all the testator's property; it cannot operate in conjunction with the executed will: the real and personal estates are connected together. Cobb v. Cobb, Prerog. May, 1803.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. The testator, Thomas Westby, died on the 17th of November, 1829, leaving considerable property, both real and personal. In January, 1812, he executed a will; and in November, 1818, he exe-[201]-cuted two codicils, disposing of his real and personal estates. This will and these codicils remained unaltered and unrevoked till January, 1828, when, for the first time, he gave instructions for a new will; at least there is no proof, nor any appearance of an intermediate testamentary act. It is true that his property had increased; that some of the parties benefited under his will were dead, among them, one of the executors; and that the deceased was parsimonious; yet still, notwithstanding these circumstances, he either, from indolence, procrastination, or unfixed and wavering intentions, suffered the will of 1812 and the codicils of 1818 to remain in force.

(a) Hilary Term, 1st Session, 1831.—In Tudor v. Tudor, Sir John Nicholl, after hearing Curteis in opposition to an allegation, and Phillimore contrà, observed, in rejecting the allegation:—

The will of 1826 disposing of real and personal estate must operate on the real estate: the instructions of the 9th of May, 1830, and now propounded, were intended as a new will blending together both the real and personal estate: against such instructions the want of due execution is conclusive; for where an unexecuted paper can only operate on the personal, and not on the real, estate, if the disposition of the former arises from, and is dependent upon, and induced by, the disposition of the latter, the Court will not interpose to give even a partial operation to such a paper, for by so doing it would defeat the testator's intention. That was stated by Sir William Wynne in Eyles v. Eyles † to be the doctrine of these Courts. That learned Judge said in that case, "There are many instances where a testator having intended to dispose of real and personal estate, the Court has given effect to the disposition as far as it can, and pronounced for the one part conveying the personalty, in other cases it has refused so to do; the distinction is this, where the devise of the realty is perfectly independent of the disposition of the personalty, then by giving effect to the unexecuted will the deceased's intention pro tanto is carried into effect; but where one part appears to depend on the other, when a testator gives to A. because he has given to B., then it would defeat the intention, and be injustice to give effect to the one unless you could to the other."

---

† 1792, Hilary Term, By-Day. See Jekyll v. Jekyll, 1 Cases temp. Sir George Lee, 419. Also Douglas v. Brown, June, 1833, in the Privy Council, on an appeal from the Island of St. Vincent, where, in a case of real and personal estate blended, the Court, reversing the sentence, gave probate to the executed will alone.

Lushington and Addams in support of the executed will, Dodson and Mr. J. Parker for the unattested paper of later date.

It is necessary, first, to consider what is the paper propounded. It is, upon the face of it, unexecuted; it is not even ready for execution; it has no date, either of a day or month: it has the date of the year 1828, but the deceased did not die till November, 1829. But more than this, the paper was intended to be altered; for there are notes in pencil in the margin of two of the pages, and also on the back: these alterations are not perhaps of any great weight, but still they are alterations. The instrument is very long, intending to convey both real and personal property, and that of considerable value. Upon the face of the paper, then, there is every presumption against it; it is not only unexecuted, but unfinished; it is to alter a former executed will which, at all events, must operate upon the real estate, although the latter paper was itself intended to operate both upon real and personal estate; and if intended to be executed at all, such intention existed as early as the year 1828—at least ten months before the deceased's death.

[202] Still, however, all these adverse presumptions may be repelled: but it must be clearly shewn that the testator had finally made up his mind, and that the execution of the instrument was prevented by the act of God, as it is termed, and that the disposition of the personalty was in no degree induced by, or dependent upon, the disposition of the real property, which must, in the present case, I repeat, be governed by the will of 1812 and the codicils of 1818, and cannot be affected by this latter instrument.

It is hardly necessary to quote authorities in support of these principles, for they are of every day's occurrence; but as the case of Cobb v. Cobb (Prerogative, 1803, Easter Term, 2nd Session) was quoted, I will, for the satisfaction of the Bar, read my own note of Sir William Wynne's decision in that case; it is as follows:—"Paper unexecuted—completely prepared: must be satisfied had finally resolved to execute, but prevented by act of God. The allegation states instructions, draft, will prepared, delivered to deceased: he kept it several months—called on the drawer in order to execute it about a fortnight before his death. On reading, approved, but said, had omitted to ask his wife whether she was satisfied with her annuity, would let it stand over till she returned. It is not alleged that his wife did not return before his sudden illness and death. With such a degree of indecision I could not pronounce that the deceased would have executed, if not prevented by act of God. But there is a former will in 1794, disposing of real and personal property, and confirmed in 1798. Dispositions in both very material and very different. Deceased did [203] not intend they should operate together. I reject the allegation."

The case, which I have just read, applies pretty directly upon all points to the present. Here is not only a former will, but both it and the instrument propounded were intended to dispose of real and personal property, and there are material differences in the disposition. By the former he gives an annuity of 500l. to Thomas Westby, and that charged on the real estate; by the latter, an annuity of only 300l., and that out of the personalty. By the former the residue is given, absolutely, to George Westby; by the latter, it is to be laid out in land, and George Westby only takes as tenant for life. But the first point, viz. whether there was a fixed and final resolution and intention to execute, and that the deceased was prevented, is the most important point; and as the evidence upon this first point may dispose of the whole question, I will proceed to consider it.

In January, 1828, the deceased is taken unwell; he gives instructions to his solicitor and confidential friend, Mr. Pilkington, for a new will. Mr. Pilkington goes home; extends the instructions; a rough draft is prepared, and it is settled by counsel. So far the matter is in regular progress: the solicitor reads to the deceased the copy engrossed for execution; some alterations are made in it; they are also settled by counsel; the altered sheets are substituted, and the whole is prepared for execution. The solicitor again reads the will very carefully and deliberately to the deceased, and presses him to execute it; but he declines, saying "that he will call at the office and execute it there;" and adds, "Why, you don't think I am going to die;" probably making this remark to [204] satisfy Mr. Pilkington that there was no necessity for an immediate execution.

The Court cannot construe the conduct of the deceased, on this occasion, than as an intimation that he wished to pause and further deliberate (though at that time he approved); he would otherwise have executed the instrument, for it was then quite ready: he could not have postponed the execution in order to avoid expence, for the expence had been incurred; nor from the vulgar prejudice that it would hasten his death, for he had executed a former will and codicils many years before.

But what is his subsequent conduct? Does he, when he goes to Preston, fulfil his promise and execute the will? On the contrary, Mr. Pilkington says that in the following month, which is March, the deceased comes to Preston; the will is again read over to him, and further alterations are made: so that, instead of doing in March what he had been pressed to do in February, and what he had then engaged to do, he revises, he reconsiders, and again makes alterations. It turns out, therefore, that in February the deceased had not finally made up his mind. But were the alterations in March final? Mr. Pilkington's conduct shews that he did not so consider them; for he does not even have the draft altered and prepared for execution: the pencil memoranda in the margin and on the back remain till the deceased's death—a year and eight months after they were made. What takes place in the mean time? Mr. Pilkington states that he had several subsequent interviews with the deceased, who "used to talk of finishing it;" thereby, in Mr. Pilkington's opinion, meaning "that he would execute it." [205] This may be the correct inference; but in what manner did he mean to execute it? Not in the form in which the instrument then stood, but after alterations; for though Mr. Pilkington goes on to depose that nothing passed to induce him to believe that the deceased, after the reading over in March, 1828, contemplated any further alterations, yet there are some alterations made; and the suggestion of the witness that the deceased postponed the execution from an apprehension that it would hasten his death is mere conjecture, and not at all borne out by the evidence.

The business thus drags on for upwards of a year and a half, during which time no step is taken—nothing whatever is done except deliberation. However, on the 14th of November, 1829, the deceased, in passing through Preston, called upon Mr. Pilkington, and that gentleman thus deposes to what occurred at this interview: "The deceased had been on a visit to Miss Westby, a legatee in his will; and, in allusion to her, he said, 'She must be taken care of' [but how? whether by what the deceased had already done for her, or by a further legacy, did not transpire]; 'that he would finish his will;' and then named Thursday, the 19th, as the day on which he would come to me for that purpose, and execute it at my office; he asked, 'Could it be completed on that day?' I told him 'it could; and that I would take care to have every thing ready for him:' he then replied 'that he would complete his will or finish it;' meaning he would execute it on that day." The witness then, after stating that the deceased said he would dine with him on that Thursday, proceeds: "Before he left me he re-[206]-minded me of the death of Mr. Carus, a legatee in his will, and that it must be altered in that respect: he was particular in asking me if it could be finished (meaning 'executed') on Thursday, if he came; and I told him 'if he wished it, it should be;' he replied, 'Then it shall be finished before I return home.'"

These are all the facts to which Mr. Pilkington can depose; and I am satisfied from the conversation which passed on the 14th of November, and from the expressions of the deceased on that occasion, that something more was meant, when he used the words "finish it," than the mere bare execution of his will. Mr. Pilkington gives it as his opinion that the deceased had fully determined to execute the will; but it is clear that it was to be revised before the execution; and I see no greater reason to conclude that he would have "finished" his will on the 19th of November, had he lived till that day, than at any of the former interviews during the preceding nineteen months; with still less reason can I conclude that the will would have been executed in its present form and shape; and the conduct of the solicitor himself shews that he was not convinced that it would so be executed, for he had not even prepared the instrument for execution; since, at all events, the alterations that now appear in pencil were to be made in ink.

Upon the whole, then, I am not satisfied that the deceased had ever finally made up his mind: he was still, I think, deliberating and indecisive: and on this ground, without referring to other objections and difficulties which would probably be found insuperable, I must pronounce that this in-[207]-strument is not entitled to probate; and I decree probate of the will of 1812, and the codicils of November, 1818.

Gostling asked for costs out of the estate. This application was not opposed and was granted.

Costs out of estate.

IN THE GOODS OF CATHERINE NOEL. Prerogative Court, Easter Term, 1st Session, 1832.—A husband, resident abroad, directed, on the application of creditors, to give justifying security resident within the jurisdiction of the Court, on taking a grant of administration to his wife.

An application was made, on behalf of creditors, that the Court would direct a husband, resident abroad, in taking letters of administration to his deceased wife, to give justifying security, and that the same should be resident within the jurisdiction of this Court.

The application was resisted on the ground that the husband was the only party entitled.

An affidavit, of which the substance follows, was before the Court:—

Philip Smith Coxe, solicitor, and James Wood, Esq., a partner in the house of Child and Co., bankers, deposed: first, Mr. Coxe, that C. Noel (wife of ———) died on the 11th day of February, 1832, intestate; that the deceased and her husband had, for a considerable time before and to the time of her death, lived separate under a deed, of which he, Coxe, was sole trustee, wherein it was agreed that she should receive a certain income, independent of her [208] husband: that as such trustee he, Coxe, now has about 148l., which is, he believes, the only property of which she died possessed in her own right, and it is not sufficient to pay her just debts; that the husband, now applying for administration to the deceased, is, he believes, in very embarrassed circumstances, residing abroad, and out of the jurisdiction of this Court. Mr. Wood deposed that the deceased was, and now is, justly indebted to Child and Co. in 76l. for money lent and advanced for her use, after her separation from her husband; that Child and Co. have not any security for the payment of the said debt, and are desirous that the husband should give justifying security before administration be granted to him.

Per Curiam. By the practice of the Court a husband taking administration to a deceased wife enters into bond with one surety. I direct that the surety, in this instance, shall justify and be resident within the jurisdiction.

[209] IN THE GOODS OF MARY KEETON. Prerogative Court, Easter Term, 2nd Session, 1832.—Probate, in common form of an unattested will, granted on the affidavit of one person only to hand-writing, and the consent of the sole person in distribution.

On motion.

The deceased, a spinster, died in August, 1831; she left about 300l., and a will written and subscribed by herself: there was no witness to it. Mr. Lawford, a solicitor, and her intimate acquaintance, could alone verify the hand-writing.

Haggard moved for probate, upon Mr. Lawford's affidavit; the sister of the deceased, her executor, sole next of kin and in distribution, also deposing that, from the deceased's retired habits and infrequency of writing, no second affidavit to hand-writing could be supplied.

Per Curiam. The affidavit of Mr. Lawford is very full and satisfactory; and the statement of the sister, who would be more benefited under an intestacy, may be taken, in proof of the hand-writing, as equal to a second affidavit. The deceased too, having been dead nine months, and no other application made, I direct the probate to pass.

Motion granted.

[210] IN THE GOODS OF ELIZA ELDERTON. Prerogative Court, Easter Term, 2nd Session, 1832.—Administration, with the will annexed, granted to the wife of a residuary legatee, as his attorney under a memorandum in his hand-writing.

Mrs. Elderton died in January, 1832: her property consisted of 800l. three per cents., and 500l. due on a note of hand. By her will (the executor of which she survived) she left several legacies, and appointed her son, Colonel Elderton, residuary legatee; he was with his regiment in India; his wife and six children were in England, the former of whom had paid the funeral expenses, and the only debt left by the deceased, and now applied for administration with the will annexed, under a memorandum, in the hand-writing of her husband, as follows:—

"Should property of any kind be bequeathed or given to my wife, Mary Elderton, during my absence from England, it is my wish that the same may be permanently settled upon her, for her sole use; but as my legal consent may be deemed necessary,

I leave this document to be considered such legal consent, and beg it may be acted upon without any reference being made to me. It is also my wish that all property left to me may in like manner be delivered over to and settled upon my said wife in any way she may wish. "C. A. ELDERTON.

"27th April, 1828."

It appeared, upon affidavit, that Colonel Elderton was not likely to return soon to England; that he had no agent or attorney in this country qualified to take the administration, and that in a [211] recent letter to his wife he had repeated the same wish as expressed in the memorandum.

Haggard moved for the administration with the will annexed to be granted to the wife of Colonel Elderton, as his attorney.

Per Curiam. I do not recollect an instance of a grant to a wife, in the absence of her husband from this country, as his agent: but here is a very full authority, and a large family to be maintained; and I see no reason why the grant should not pass. The securities will justify.

Motion granted.

HATTATT v. HATTATT. Prerogative Court, Easter Term, 2nd Session, 1832.—An entry in an account-book, containing a full disposition of the property, appointment of executor, dated eight months before the testatrix's death, which was sudden, subscribed, and carefully preserved, pronounced for, though containing these words. "I intend this as a sketch of my will which I intend making on my return home."

[Distinguished, Whyte v. Pollock, 1882, 7 A. C. 411.]

On the admission of an allegation.

The allegation, in substance, pleaded that Martha Hattatt, a spinster, died on the 7th of December, 1829, leaving a brother, several nephews and nieces of different stocks, and property exceeding 4000l.; that she lived with her brother, but in the autumn of 1828 went to Falmouth for change of air, being in a consumption; that while at Falmouth she wrote her will in an account-book; signed it, dated it the 30th of May, 1829; that in June she returned to her brother's; preserved the book, and wrote memoranda in it; and a few days before her death declared (upon one of the legatees saying to her "that on her death she [212] should not have a friend") "Yes, you will have a friend," thereby meaning her said brother, the executor, and the benefit that the legatee would take under the will; that her death was sudden, and that the paper, after her death, was found locked up in her private desk.

The paper commenced thus: "My watch and three gold rings to my brother Henry, who I appoint executor." It contained a complete disposition of her property; and at the conclusion repeated the appointment of her brother as executor. Just above the deceased's signature were these words—"I intend this as a sketch of my will, which I intend making on my return home."

The allegation was opposed and admitted; evidence was taken upon it, and the answers admitted, generally, the contents of the allegation.

The King's advocate in support of the paper.

Lushington contrà, cited Mathews v. Warner.(a)

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. The paper is a complete disposition of the property; and though it is described "sketch of a will I intend to make," yet it is signed and dated. Such an instrument must, under the circumstances here admitted, be presumed valid, and intended to take effect, in case the deceased did not make a more formal paper. In Mathews v. Warner the deceased himself did not con-[213]-sider the instrument final; here, however, there are circumstances shewing adherence of intention, and I pronounce for the paper and decree probate to the executor.

Costs out of the estate.

RUTHERFORD v. MAULE, SHARD, AND BEASLEY. Prerogative Court, Trinity Term, 3rd Session, 1832.—A paper—not found in the deceased's repositories, never traced into his possession, never recognised, nor alluded to, by him by declaration or act, but transmitted anonymously to the parties interested in 1820 (the deceased having died in May, 1819), treated by them at that time as a forgery, but propounded as her will in 1831—rejected, evidence of the probability of the disposition and of similitude of hand-writing (which moreover was contradictory) being insufficient to support such a paper, and the other evidence leading to the conclusion that the deceased had not written, and could not, from bodily infirmity, have written such a paper at the time it purported to bear date: and a claim of relationship, by a party asserting himself to be cousin-german and next of kin, resting upon no documentary proof, but upon evidence of declarations, contradictory in themselves, and inconsistent with the real facts of the case, pronounced against, but without costs: and an administration—granted to the Crown, as of the deceased being dead intestate—without known relations—confirmed.—It is a rule of the court that, in cases of pedigree, a party has no right to see the adverse plea till he has set out his own pedigree.

(a) 4 Ves. jun. 200, n. See also Mitchell v. Mitchell, 2 Hagg. Ecc. 74.

Frances Mary Shard, late of Torbay House, Devon, widow, died on the 16th of May, 1819. George Maule, Esq., as nominee of his Majesty, after the usual proceedings by advertisements and by decree to find a will or discover her next of kin, obtained, on the 26th of April, 1820, letters of administration of her goods for the use and benefit of the Crown. After four memorials to the Crown, supported by affidavits and letters of recommendation, setting forth that the deceased had left no relation, nor any will, and enumerating a variety of persons as the declared intended objects of her testamentary bounty, the Crown, by warrant bearing date the 31st of December, 1823, made the grants which will hereafter be specified.

On the 16th of December, 1830, a proctor exhibited for John Rutherford, an alleged cousin-german and only next of kin of Mrs. Shard, deceased; the administration was consequently brought in; the interest of Rutherford propounded, an allegation admitted, and evidence taken, both on his behalf and also on behalf of the Crown; when on the first session of Trinity Term, 1831, a proctor intervened for Charles Shard, Esq. (nephew of the deceased's husband), [214] and for Thomas Beasley, as surviving executors of Mrs. Shard's will, bearing date the 20th of April, 1819. This instrument, which is printed in the judgment, was opposed.

Phillimore and Dodson in support of the paper propounded.

Lushington for John Rutherford, claiming to be next of kin.

The King's advocate and Addams for the Crown.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. This case involves two questions—first, the validity of a paper propounded as the will of the deceased; secondly, the relationship of a party claiming to be next of kin.

The deceased, Frances Mary Shard, died on the 16th of May, 1819, at the age of sixty, intestate, and without relations as it was then supposed: her property amounted to about 24,000l. The usual steps to discover relations having been in vain taken, administration was granted to Mr. Maule, his Majesty's nominee, and shortly afterwards applications for grants of parts of the property were addressed to the liberality of the Crown by Mr. Bowring, a solicitor at Exeter, on behalf of himself and others, viz. Mr. Beasley, Mr. Shard, Mrs. Bishop, and the deceased's old servants.

This memorial, as far at least as it seems to bear materially on the present case, stated that for upwards of thirty years Mr. Bowring had been one of the most intimate friends of Mrs. Shard, and for more than twenty years the solicitor of her and of her [215] husband while he lived; that as Mrs. Shard could not discover her relations she had often declared that she would leave the memorialist, his wife, and children, a considerable property, and appoint him an executor; that by a will duly executed by her, in her husband's life, she had largely benefited the memorialist, &c. &c., made provision for her servants, and other objects of her bounty; that two or three years before, her death she asked him, "whether he had her will;" and on his informing her that he had returned it to her, she replied "that she did not know what could have become of it, and that she wanted it to make a new will;" and she communicated to the memorialist her intentions as to the disposition of her property; that Mrs. Shard completely educated Thomas Beasley, gave him the superintendence of her house, treated him in all respects as an adopted child, and frequently declared "that she would leave him by her will sufficient to enable him to live as a gentleman and to support a wife and family," and that he continued to reside with, and enjoy the confidence of, Mrs. Shard to her death. The memorial then, after stating testamentary declarations in favour of Mrs. Cumming, Mrs. Chissem, Mrs. Bishop, Mrs. Deller, Charles Shard, Esq., the nephew and heir-at-law of her late husband, set forth that in January, and again in April, 1819, Mrs. Shard expressed to the memorialist her intentions of making a will, at the same time requesting him "not to alarm himself, as she had no doubt she would soon get better;" that she shortly afterwards became worse, and experienced great difficulty in speaking from a soreness and swelling in her mouth, which alone, as the memorialist believes, prevented her [216] making her will as she intended; that during the whole course of her illness and on her death-bed she treated Thomas Beasley and the memorialist with the utmost kindness and affection: it then stated that after the most diligent search by the memorialist, by Charles Shard, Esq., and Thomas Beasley, no will could be found.

These are the material parts of this memorial. An affidavit made by Bowring in support of this memorial bears date on the 16th of June, 1819; and on the 23d the Treasury referred this memorial to the King's proctor, and afterwards signified its refusal to make any such grant, assigning as a reason that so short an interval had elapsed since the decease that relations might still probably be discovered: but neither in the original application, nor upon the refusal, nor in a memorial presented by Beasley (which bears date on the 28th of September, 1819, and is similar to that presented by Bowring) was there any suggestion that the deceased left any will, nor that any testamentary instrument had been subducted, nor that any such suspicion was entertained; the whole representation was that the deceased died intestate.

In February, 1820, a paper, purporting to be a will in the hand-writing of the deceased, was sent in an anonymous letter to Mr. Charles Shard, one of the executors therein named jointly with Mr. Bowring and with Beasley. The letter bears the Exeter post-mark, and is in these terms:

"Sir,—When I got possession of the enclosed paper I did not intend to give it up to you; but I have been ill, and as I do not know how soon I may be called to give up my account I would not [217] have this burden on my conscience, therefore though I am ashamed to acknowledge my name I send it to you, and shall be glad to find it is not too late to those interested in it, which I am sorry to say I am not. I have no right to ask a favour of you, but I should be much obliged if you would not say publicly how you got this: you might find it at the house. I would have replaced it there if I could without being found out."

This letter bears an endorsement as follows:—"13th of June, 1820, received from Mr. Shard."

The paper, purporting to be a will, alluded to in the letter which I have just read, is in these terms:

"I, F. Shard, of Torbay House, Devon, widow, finding my health decline, do make this will, that is to say, I hereby appoint Wm. Bowring, solicitor, Chas. Shard, Esq., and Thos. Beasley to be my joint executors, except that I give to Thos. Beasley four thousand pounds more than my other executors. I give to my friend Mrs. Bishop one hundred a year for her life, to Mrs. Chessem sixty pounds a year for her life, and to her sister Mrs. Ryder ten pounds a year for hers; to Mary Ann Cumming I give three thousand pounds, to Fanny Good I bequeath one thousand pounds, to the three daughters of my friend Wm. Bowring I bequeath five hundred pounds each, and the same sum each to the two daughters of Wm. Lee; to the widow of my faithful servant Thos. Deller I give twenty-five pounds a year for her life; to the servants in my family at my death, if they have been fifteen years in my service, I bequeath twenty pounds a year for their lives; to any one who may have been ten years with me I give ten [218] pounds a year for their lives, and to any one who have been a shorter time than that I give five pounds a year for theirs, and I desire that my clothes and jewels may be equally divided between Wm. Bowring's three daughters, M. A. Cumming, and F. Good. 20th of April, 1819. I would not forget the poor of this parish, to whom I bequeath twenty pounds a year to be distributed as my executors think proper. "F. SHARD."

The letter and the document it enclosed, coming in this mysterious way, were treated at the time by Mr. Shard either as a forgery or a trick, and he made no attempt to set up the paper: however, in June, 1820, when all the deceased's papers were delivered up to the administrator—the nominee of the Crown—this paper was transmitted among them; but up to that moment all the papers had been in the possession of the parties benefited under this document, during which time there was ample opportunity to frame a will, and to imitate the deceased's hand-writing.

But this at least is clear, that after a careful examination, as I must presume, by Bowring, the deceased's solicitor, by Shard, and by Beasley, no attempt was made to set up this instrument; no notice even of it was given to Mr. Maule, the nominee of the Crown; for if notice had been given he would have produced it to the King's proctor before he took the oath that the deceased was to the best of his knowledge intestate; and both he and the King's proctor would have thought it their duty to give information to all the parties interested under the paper; they would not have ventured on their own responsibility to sup-[219]-press such an instrument; but the parties, instead of bringing this paper under the observation of Mr. Maule, place it without remark among a bundle of papers delivered up to him on the 13th of June, 1820; and they rely on the grants which they hoped, by memorial, to obtain from the Crown.

In June, 1822, no relations having been discovered, further memorials of considerable length were presented to the Treasury by Bowring and by Beasley on behalf of themselves and others, again representing the deceased as intestate. These memorials were supported by various affidavits sworn in 1822, and by recommendatory letters, particularly in favour of Beasley. The affidavits are by Bowring, by Beasley, by Mr. Eastley, by Mr. Thompson, who attended the deceased as a surgeon, and by Webber, Morris and Farris, three of her late servants. Bowring, in his memorial referring to his former petition, states that diligent but fruitless inquiries in America were commenced in 1800 and carried on for several years at the desire and expense of Mrs. Shard, in order to discover her relations; and details with great minuteness the bequests of Mrs. Shard's will, made in her husband's lifetime, and again sets forth her testamentary declarations to Bowring, and her intentions quite to the close of her life of making an ample provision for him and his family, for Beasley, for Mrs. Bishop and for others; but "that by reason of the said Frances Mary Shard having omitted to make her will as she intended, the entire prospects in life of the said Thomas Beasley are destroyed, the said Ann Chissem and several other persons, for whom she purposed to provide, are left totally destitute, and [220] they, together with the petitioner, his family, and divers other persons, will be deprived of those parts of the property of Mrs. Shard which she meant to bequeath them, unless the Crown in the exercise of its bounty shall direct a distribution according to her intentions." Beasley's memorial and affidavit in confirmation are to the same effect. Still no suggestion is made of the existence of any will, though these individuals at this time had full knowledge of the document bearing date the 20th of April, 1819, and now before the Court.

In consequence of these applications and no relations having, now that three years had elapsed since the death, been discovered, considerable grants were made to those persons whom, from the statements in the several memorials and affidavits, it was deemed probable that the deceased had intended to benefit: but, as usual, when the grants were paid, security was taken from the grantees to refund in case any persons should appear and make good their claim as relations or under a will; for in either case the Crown would be a mere trustee for them.(a)

For several years, viz. up to 1830, matters remained in this position, when a person, the party, James Rutherford, called in the administration, alleging himself to be a relation not more distant than a cousin-german; but averring that, being a [221] soldier and quartered in different remote places, he had never heard of the enquiry made after the relations. He gave in an allegation on which several witnesses were examined in Ireland, and a requisition, taken out to examine others in America, was about to be there executed, when, in the middle of the year 1831, the King's proctor, in looking over the deceased's papers with a view to frame his answers to Rutherford's allegation, discovered the paper propounded as the will, and also the anonymous letter which accompanied it. That discovery was immediately notified to all the parties interested; and the executors then thought proper to set up the paper. What had worked this change in their opinion of its authenticity? Length of time could not, under the circumstances, have invested it with any greater authority; on the contrary, it surrounded it with great difficulties. If they thought it a forgery in 1820, why did they think more favourably of it in 1831? It was not originally produced till February, 1820, nine months after the death; there had been then abundant time to fabricate it. According to their own statement it remained for three months in their possession before they delivered the papers to the administrator; there was then also abundant time to satisfy themselves if there were any grounds to think it genuine, or any truth in the pretended subduction. It was in the hands of the persons most competent to judge both of the hand-writing and of its probable authenticity.

---

(a) The grants were—to Mr. Lee, of Exeter, 4500l.; to Thomas Beasley, 4500l.; to Mrs. Bishop, 500l.; to Mrs. Cumming, 1000l.; to Charles Shard (the nephew of the late William Shard), 1000l. in trust for Ann Chissem; to Mrs. Deller, 200l.; to Webber, Winser, Morris, and Farris, living with Mrs. Shard at her death, 50l. each; to Miss Shard (niece of the late William Shard), 2000l., also the reversion of the 1000l. in trust for Chissem; and to William Bowring, 1000l.

Bowring, who had been for twenty years the deceased's confidential solicitor, must have been well acquainted with her hand-writing: he is now dead; his evidence, therefore, is lost. If Mr. Shard was [222] not acquainted with her hand-writing, at least he was well able to judge of her real intentions, and had the means of consulting those who were acquainted with her hand-writing—with her ability to write—with the fact whether she was ever seen or suspected to write. Joan Cock was living in Mr. Shard's service; he shewed the paper to her in February, 1820, and he was in communication with the persons affected by it. He himself had a strong interest to enquire and must have enquired; yet he treats it as a forgery. Beasley too, the deceased's inmate—her adopted son—her amanuensis—who was constantly with her, particularly during her last illness, and the others who were much about her at that time, all treat it as a forgery. These persons were not only well acquainted with her hand-writing, but in possession of all her papers for upwards of a year after her death, and therefore had ample means of satisfying themselves respecting this document by a comparison of it with genuine documents. If they suspected that this document had been subducted and again from conscience restored, as the letter suggests, then was their time to have produced the paper and to have made exertions to discover the person who had subducted it. Then, recenti facto, all the witnesses would have proved with much greater effect the circumstances, if there were any, to support and establish its validity; the lapse of eleven years has greatly enhanced the difficulty of ascertaining the authenticity of the instrument, of proving the hand-writing, of substantiating subsidiary facts, and, above all, of accounting for their own conduct in treating the instrument as a forgery at the time, and in concealing their knowledge of its existence from that hour.

[223] It is quite unaccountable, then, if the story be true, and the paper genuine, why it was not brought forward in 1820: however, from some reason or other, the parties did not venture at that time to produce it. On the contrary the memorials and the affidavits, both in 1820 and 1822, treat the matter of Mrs. Shard's property as one of intestacy, and tell a story quite inconsistent with the present case. And not only in the memorials, and on oath, but in a confidential letter from Beasley, in August, 1819, he speaks as if no will existed, still less does he suggest that any suspicion had entered his mind that it had been subducted. If, subsequently, the person who had subducted it, and who had written the letter, were ascertained by satisfactory and competent evidence, the mystery might have been solved, but no explanation is afforded. In 1831 the transaction is quite as mysterious and improbable as it was in 1820; indeed, when the detached facts are investigated, still more mysterious and improbable. The reason, however, why, in 1831, the parties assert that to be genuine which, in 1820, they treated as a forgery, is far from inexplicable. Many of the parties (not indeed Mr. Shard, but still he had a strong interest) had received grants from the Crown; now, therefore, that a claimant as a next of kin had appeared, if his relationship were established, the monies granted must have been refunded either by the grantees or their securities. To escape from that obligation they would catch at any straw, they would take any chance however desperate; they, and some of their witnesses, had every possible inducement to endeavour to sustain this paper in 1831—inducements which did not exist in 1820.

[224] What, then, are the grounds relied on to support the authenticity of this paper? First, similitude of hand-writing. Secondly, the probability of the disposition. But one great ingredient is wanting—a connexion of the paper with the deceased. There is nothing whatever to connect it with her: it was not found in her repositories; it has not been traced into her possession at any time; there is no recognition of, or allusion to, it by her, either by declaration or by act; not even any one witness who deposes that she was seen writing about the time it bears date, or in any way engaged on a paper similar in appearance.

It has always been the doctrine of this Court—a doctrine founded upon sound reason, alike important to the security of property, and to the protection of the rights of relations—that similitude of hand-writing, even with a probable disposition, is not sufficient, without something to connect the document with the deceased. From this doctrine, which is to be found in Crisp and Ryder v. Walpole (a) and in other cases, I am not disposed to depart, though I accede to the proposition that the Court must look into, accurately distinguish between, and ultimately decide each case upon its own circumstances.

Similitude of hand-writing is at best the weakest of all evidence as a foundation of proof. Evidence to it depends on mere opinion; there is no fact like an act of execution. Hand-writing can be imitated with such perfect exactitude as to deceive even the most practised eye, and the most minute [225] examination. True it is that the imitation of an holograph is far more difficult than of a mere signature, but here were abundant time, and plenty of holograph papers—old letters of the deceased—in the possession of the parties, by the help and study of which they might acquire a power of imitating her writing with all its peculiarities, the introduction of which would give to the instrument the semblance of genuineness. For example, if sometimes in the name of Bowring she did not insert an "e," and sometimes in the same letter she did interpose the "e," the introduction of that mistake would be an ingenious mode of imitating her writing. The persons in possession of these documents were good penmen, and had, in 1820, the strongest interest for fabricating such a paper; for they were then uncertain whether any grants from the Crown would be made, or whether relations might not appear. The Court must not be understood as intending to express any suspicion of those persons Beasley and Bowring, and still less of Mr. Shard. Though they had possession of the deceased's papers, though the fabrication is not an impossibility, though they all, from February to June, 1820, treated the instrument propounded as a forgery, and never afterwards suggested its genuineness till 1831, yet the Court does not charge them with the fabrication of it, that is not a question which this Court is called upon to decide.

Again, as to the probability of the disposition. It is true the deceased had a great regard for Beasley, for Bowring, for Mrs. Bishop, and for others of the parties benefited; and it is highly probable that if she made any will these persons would be objects of her testamentary bounty. [226] If then the act had been connected with the deceased, and the question had turned on her capacity, volition, or on fraudulent imposition, the high probability of the bequests would have had much influence on the decision; but as proof that the instrument is not a forgery, the probability of the bequests is of very little weight; for any person sitting down to forge a will would introduce into it probable bequests, and also bequests to those persons who would be best able to prove it a forgery, in order to conciliate and quiet them. Probability of disposition is, therefore, consistent either with the supposition that the paper is forged or that it is genuine. Even then, if there was nothing opposed to those two ingredients, I should hardly venture to pronounce for this paper, unless the third species of proof were supplied, viz. the connection of the instrument in some manner with the deceased; as, for instance, either by being found or seen in her possession, or distinctly recognized and referred to by her as her act; but what would be a sufficient connection must depend upon all the circumstances of the particular case.

What, however, is the proof of hand-writing, and what is there opposed to it? In the first place, the deceased did not write much for twelve years before her death, since from the time Beasley left school, viz. from 1810, he wrote everything for her. But how is the affirmative of this part of the case sustained? William Court, who lived with her as a servant in her husband's life-time (and he died in 1806), states that while in her service he frequently saw her write, and he has produced two letters written by Mrs. Shard to him in 1794 and 1796; he had not seen the deceased for twenty years, and he is himself of the age of seventy-nine, [227] yet he has no doubt that the paper is all in his late mistress' hand-writing. Pierce also was in her service, during her husband's life-time, viz. from 1796 to 1804; still, although his acquaintance with her writing has so long ceased, he has no doubt that the paper is genuine: and Mrs. Bishop, who undoubtedly had better opportunities of forming a correct judgment, "does not hesitate" in her opinion. I shall see hereafter what weight is due to the opinion of this releasing and refunding witness. Horn, a carpenter, and a very old man, knew the deceased from 1786; and he fully believes that the paper is in her hand-writing. John Webber is also a releasing witness, but expects compensation, and trusts to the generosity of the parties if the will is established. Even Davies had not seen her write for many years. Affirmative evidence of hand-writing less satisfactory has seldom been produced. Many old letters are before the Court; some of them differing a good deal from others; but several of them are in a loose, broad, scrambling, coarse hand, easily imitated as to general character. However, as to judging by comparison, the Court never ventures to proceed on any such unsatisfactory ground. In respect to the evidence against the writing being that of the deceased, I do not much rely on the witness Joan Cock, though she had great means of judging; and if she be worthy of any credit her evidence would be deserving of some attention; she is a married woman, and has been examined both on behalf of the asserted next of kin and of the Crown. In answer to the eighth interrogatory, on her examination upon Rutherford's allegations, she says that the will was shewn to her by her master, Mr. Shard, in 1820, and she then declared that [228] it was not the deceased's writing. She has again carefully observed the writing, and she assigns, as the reasons for her disbelief of its genuineness, the deceased's incapacity to write, from bodily infirmity, and besides that the figure of 8 does not resemble that figure as made by the deceased. Now this may be a trivial circumstance, but it is singular that there is no instance in any of the letters produced, where the deceased has made that figure in the form in which it appears in the will, viz. with the up-stroke to the left. This fact gives considerable weight to the observation, the accuracy, and correct memory of the witness, unless indeed she has been tutored, and the evidence was preconcerted, for that is the explanation attempted. The difference is pointed out by her, as far as would seem, from memory, from observation, and not from comparison. It does not appear that she had ever seen those exhibits, which so strongly confirm her testimony; and they were not produced for the purpose of shewing how the deceased made the figure of 8. The circumstance of the difference was not pointed out till the evidence of Cock was published: it is not a difference pleaded; it is not a difference, as far as appears, that she comes prepared to depose to; for it is not mentioned in her deposition in chief, it is brought out from her on interrogatory. If she had been tutored, would she have waited till the interrogatory? How was she to know that any such interrogatory would be put to her? It is just possible, but not probable, that she was tutored; but, on the other hand, forgeries are frequently detected by little oversights of this sort, establishing not only the dissimilitude but the diversity. Yet, still [229] I do not rely on her opinion: but the coincidence strikes me as very singular.

(a) 2 Hagg. Ecc. 531. See also Constable v. Steibel and Emanuel, 1st ibid. 60. Headington v. Holloway, 3 ibid. 280. Machin and Tyndall v. Grindon, 2 Cases temp. Sir George Lee, 406. Saph v. Atkinson, 1 Add. 212.

This, however, is not the only circumstance against the hand-writing. The opinion of all the executors, and all others to whom the writing was shewn, as deduced from their conduct, is evidence against the hand-writing; it is evidence of persons well acquainted with the deceased's writing, of persons interested in believing the authenticity of the paper, and yet abandoning it as a forgery. A still more important circumstance is, that the parties have not attempted to support the paper by any extrinsic fact, such as that the deceased was seen writing at or about this time by those around her. Even Beasley does not pretend that he ever saw her so engaged about the time of the date. There is no declaration that she intended to do, or had done, a testamentary act; no wish expressed that materials should be brought her; no step taken towards a testamentary act, either in her own hand or by the assistance of others, is attempted to be proved. On the contrary, any such fact is negatived by the statements contained in the memorials on oath of Mr. Beasley, one of the alleged executors.

That this instrument was written by the deceased on the 20th of April is also negatived by a subsequent application to Dr. Blackall, on the 28th of April, or beginning of May, to propose to the deceased to make a will, and Bowring was even offended because she had not been sufficiently pressed. No suspicion that she had made a will on the 20th of that month could then exist. This is not all; it is pretty strongly proved, first, that she had no opportunity, on the 20th of April, of writing this instrument without being seen; and, secondly, [230] that from bodily infirmity she was incapable of writing it.

As to the first. What were the condition and circumstances of the deceased at the time this instrument bears date? She was a widow, having buried her husband about fifteen years before. The husband had left her his estate for life, and she was possessed of considerable personal property at her own disposal. She had adopted Beasley when a child—the son of a sister of one of her servants—she had put him to school, taken him into her house, declared her intention of providing for him, and he was her amanuensis. For some years Mrs. Bishop (the wife of a watch-maker, in Portland Street) had resided with her as a rather humble companion. The deceased had a house in Harley Street, and also a residence at Torbay; she had a pretty large establishment of men and maid servants, but for the last three or four years of her life, being subject to gout, she had resided in a very recluse manner at Torbay House, where she inhabited two rooms on the first floor, one as a sitting room, the other as a bed-room, but none of the servants, except her own maid, had access to her; Cock and Mrs. Bishop alone attended her. The other persons who occasionally had access to her were Mr. Beasley, Mr. Bowring, Mr. Shard, and her apothecary, Mr. Thompson. During her last illness, on the 27th of April, Dr. Blackall was called in, and for the last two nights her old servant, Harris, came to assist in attendance upon her; but at that time she was insensible. Mr. Shard visited her in March, and after that visit she had a severe attack of gout, from which she was considerably recovered on Easter Sunday, the 11th of April, and in the early part of that week she was [231] so delighted at the improvement in her health that the servants had a merry making on the grass plot, and while she sat at the window looking on, she was so much pleased and laughed so that some of the witnesses thought her intellects must have rather failed her.

It is not surprising that witnesses, who are brought to depose to these circumstances after a dozen years, differ in some of the details, and in some of the dates; but there are dates and details on which most of the witnesses on both sides agree. They agree that this merry making was at latest on Easter Tuesday; they agree that she had been ill before, and became ill again—the date of this second illness I will presently enquire into. The will is dated on the 20th of April; it is a pretty long instrument. Bishop admits that the writing of it would at least have occupied the deceased an hour, the writing and composition probably more. The deceased was in a very weak state, almost constantly attended by some of the persons I have mentioned; even at night her door was left open in order that Mrs. Bishop might hear if she wanted any thing, and yet neither Bishop, nor Dolly Cock, nor Beasley, nor Bowring, nor Thompson (if he was in attendance), nor any one person in the house had the least knowledge or suspicion that the deceased had written the will, or had been employed in writing at all; nor that any will had been written for her. True it is that in consequence of her declaration of an intention to provide for Beasley, and for Mrs. Bishop, and for her servants, an impression prevailed that she had left a will, but all her declarations apply not to a will made on the 20th of April, but to a will "long agone," or to a wish "to go to town and alter" [232] her will. When Mr. Shard visited her in March she said "he would find a will to his satisfaction in that drawer."

This belief, then, that the deceased had made a will, tends in no manner to support the will dated the 20th of April, as the act of the deceased. The question is not, whether it is probable that the deceased intended to die intestate; nor whether it is probable that if she did leave a will it would have disposed of her property just as this paper does: but the fact to be proved is, whether she did actually write this very instrument, thus mysteriously produced nine months after her death. Even without supposing an actual inability to write at all, it seems next to impossible that she could have had an opportunity of secretly writing this paper herself, and of putting it away without any one circumstance of corroboration, or the slightest suspicion in the mind of any person around her, that such a transaction had been in progress.

It is, however, on the other hand, alleged that from her bodily infirmities she was actually unable to do such an act as this by herself, in this secret manner. It may be hardly necessary to examine this fact with minute accuracy. To support that allegation Joan Cock firmly deposes; and in contradiction Mrs. Bishop is as positive. In respect to the relative credit of these two witnesses, it may be observed that Joan Cock has no connection with the parties; she is so far respectable that she was taken into Mr. Shard's service, and continued therein a considerable time; she is deposing against her own interest, and positively denies any promise or understanding that she is to receive any compensation. On the other hand, Mrs. Bishop is not merely a releasing witness, but she has [233] received a grant from the Crown, which must be refunded if the will be set aside, and the relationship established: she has every possible bias in her mind to support the will, and her deposition contains strong marks either of the influence of that bias, or else of her total want of memory—take one fact as an example. There is nothing more clearly established than this merry making on the green in Easter week; it is spoken to by witnesses on both sides, who state that the deceased was at the window, and that Mrs. Bishop was supporting her; and yet Mrs. Bishop has no recollection whatever of any such circumstance. On the other hand, Joan Cock is in some measure confirmed by the other servant, Sally Godbere, and by Newman; who, though they did not see the deceased at this time, yet, from the representation both of Joan Cock and of Mrs. Bishop, fully understood at the time that the deceased was in so infirm a state as to be helpless. Again, Mrs. Bishop attempts to fix the commencement of the deceased's last illness after the 20th of April, viz. on the 25th or 26th; but was not Mrs. Bishop's memory here also treacherous? Did not the deceased become ill and suffer a relapse on the 17th or 18th, a week sooner? Their own witnesses say the relapse was in Easter week, and as if she had caught cold by looking out of the window on the Easter Tuesday. The other evidence is to the same effect; but the very entry in Dr. Blackall's book, minutely detailing the general appearance of Mrs. Shard, her age and symptoms of disease, tends strongly to shew that her illness was of some standing when he was sent for on the 27th of that month; and that such was the case is much more in accordance with probability and with general conduct than that Mr. [234] Bowring should send away to Exeter for Dr. Blackall, merely because she was "a little sick" on Sunday, as Mrs. Bishop relates, instead of first seeing what Mr. Thompson, the apothecary, could do for her. All this evidence assists in satisfying the Court that the deceased had neither the opportunity nor the ability to make this will at the time it bears date. If so, the executors have failed in proving that it is the will of the deceased. This might even have been the result if the instrument had been found in her repositories. The facts and evidence might possibly have led to the conclusion that it had been fraudulently placed there. But it is not necessary for me to consider the evidence with reference to such a state of circumstances; here are the original additional mystery and suspicion hanging over the case: it is not proved that the paper was in the deceased's possession, or that it was ever referred to, or recognized by her.

Who should have taken it from her repositories? Who had any inducement? Not Bishop—she was benefited by it: not Cock—she was provided for: not Farris—she could not even write, and here is her oath in support of an intestacy. This fact is proved and not denied, that the evening before the deceased died, when she was insensible, Beasley did open her repositories, took out some papers, and sent them to his own room. That is admitted: whether they were sent by Cock or Farris he doubts, and it is immaterial. One of the witnesses states that papers were also sent by Farris after the death—on the Sunday—and were deposited in the butler's pantry. Both stories may be true. The Court does not join Cock in casting any suspicion on Bowring and Beasley, that they subducted and destroyed any will: if any [235] will were found there, it could only have been subducted because it did not sufficiently provide for them, or because it was supposed not to be valid from an insufficient execution. But the Court is not warranted in forming any conjectures or expressing any suspicions tending to unravel this mystery. I am only called upon to decide whether the executors have succeeded in establishing the instrument in question to have been written and signed by the deceased. The manner in which it was produced appeared at first to create very great difficulties: these difficulties have not been removed by the evidence; the parties themselves in 1820 considered these difficulties insurmountable. They are not less insurmountable at present. Upon the whole result of this part of the case I must pronounce against the paper propounded, and that the deceased, so far as appears, is dead intestate.

The next consideration is whether the deceased has left any known relations.

The case set up is that the common ancestor was one James Rutherford, a wheelwright, at Moira, in Ireland, who in 1720 married Dolly Wait, and died in 1748; that Dolly survived and died in 1785; that they had issue of this marriage five children, Margaret, James, John, Samuel, and Robert. Margaret married Henderson, but died without issue. James, who was of no trade, and was idle, lame, and imbecile, lived and died a bachelor in Ireland. John, a whitesmith, at Lurgan, married and left a daughter, but she is dead. Samuel, a wheelwright, married, in 1750 or 1751 Mary Mercer, and was the father of John Rutherford, the claimant, and three other children, who died [236] without issue. Robert enlisted in the Dragoons in 1740, was wounded in Germany in 1743; returned to Ireland in 1747, married Mary Brine at Dublin in 1752, had three daughters, Sarah, Margaret, and Agnes, all born in Ireland: from Ireland Robert went to America in 1755, kept an inn at Trenton, where he had two other children, Frances Mary, the deceased, and a son, who died young. Of none of these links is there any public documentary evidence, no entries of baptisms, marriages, or burials, and the excuse is that they were Presbyterians, and that no registers of that sect are made or kept; that the transactions are very remote, and are sufficiently proved by reputation and acknowledgment: and so indeed they may be, if the evidence is clear of all doubt and suspicion, but there is no documentary evidence of any other sort; no marriage settlements, no entries in family books, no testamentary acts, no correspondence between any of these parties, still less of Robert, either with his parents, brothers, nephews, or any other persons: all depends upon parol evidence of declarations. There is indeed one entry—the entry of the baptism of Margaret, daughter of Robert and Mary Rutherford, on the 7th of March, 1755, but there is nothing to fix the identity; the name is not uncommon; there can be no difficulty in finding corresponding names, but the name of the deceased's mother was Margaret, not Mary: the diversity of the parties then is proved rather than the identity.

The administration granted to the Crown in 1819 was not called in by the present claimant, John Rutherford, till 1830. This was the more extraordinary, because he asserts his relationship to be as near as a cousin-german, and that he is one of a [237] numerous family; some of whom and their connexions were living in no very remote part of Ireland, in the county of Down: nor was it the less extraordinary, as it appears that the deceased herself for three or four years, viz. from 1798 to 1802, was using every possible means to discover relations, and if Caldwell, one of the witnesses, is entitled to credit, both the claimant and the deceased had made enquiries some years before for information respecting Robert Rutherford; yet neither these first enquiries, nor the enquiries by the deceased herself, nor by the advertisements after her death, nor the subsequent claims of relationship by others in 1823, bring forth any claim for any of these parties till this John Rutherford launches his claim in 1830. Under these circumstances, more especially the relationship being so near, and the property so large, clear and indisputable proof that the claim is well founded is requisite, because there has been time and inducement to trump up a false case.

The main point is whether Robert, the son of James, actually went to America, there settled at Trenton, and was the father of Mrs. Shard, which point I will now consider.

Assuming John to be the grandson of James, the wheelwright, and of Dolly Wait, and son of Samuel, the wheelwright, and nephew of John, the whitesmith, at Lurgan —assuming also, and of which there is no doubt, that Mrs. Shard, the deceased, was the daughter of a Robert Rutherford, of Trenton, in America—is there satisfactory evidence that Robert Rutherford, of Trenton, was the son of James the wheelwright? The only proof is the evidence of three witnesses who swear that they heard Robert Rutherford at Trenton [238] make declarations bearing that inference. This, at the best, would be most dangerous evidence, under such circumstances as have taken place in this case. These three witnesses are deposing to declarations made forty or fifty years ago, with a large property at stake; no living person to contradict, no document whatever to support, their testimony. Discrepancies and variations there are between these witnesses such as shake their credit, and which have been fully and minutely pointed out by counsel, and though the replies given to the objections have been ingenious, they are not sufficient to satisfy my judgment.

But the testimony of these three witnesses is falsified by better evidence—by documents written many years ago, irreconcilable with the present case. Fortunately a wholesome rule obtains here, that in cases of pedigree a party has no right to see the adverse plea till he has set out his own pedigree: the documents, then, to which I have just alluded, were not seen till the allegation setting out the claimant's pedigree had been given in. Now, it appears that about 1776 or 1777, if not earlier, the deceased, when about 15 or 16 years of age, eloped from America with Mr. Fortescue;

he died about 1781: in January, 1788, she married Mr. Shard, a gentleman of fortune, and, having no children, she subsequently became very anxious to discover her relations. Upon quitting America she had left at Trenton her father, then a widower, and three sisters, but, owing to the circumstances under which she had quitted America, she does not appear to have kept up any correspondence with her family; when, however, she became desirous of ascertaining what relations she had, she employed her confidential solicitor, [239] Mr. Bowring, to write to Trenton for information respecting them; and she furnished him with all the particulars she could recollect; and not having left America till she was 15 or 16, she, from the conversation of her parents and elder sisters, must have learnt every thing that her parents might think proper to disclose respecting themselves. From her statement it is quite clear that she had never heard any mention made of her grandfather James, the wheelwright, or of her uncle Samuel, the wheelwright, or of John, the whitesmith, or of the town of Moira, or Lurgan, or of this marriage at Dublin, or of her mother Mary: she was doubtful whether her family came from Ireland or Scotland: she understood her father had been married in London; she understood, and she could hardly be mistaken by possibility, that her mother's name was not Mary but Margaret; she understood that her elder sister, and her elder sister only, was born in England, and was also named Margaret, like her mother; she understood her father's family were not wheelwrights and smiths, but persons of some consideration, and that though her father had enlisted in the Black Dragoons, yet that his colonel procured him a commission.

These and other circumstances are stated in the deceased's letter of 19th December, 1798, and in Mr. Bowring's letter of 28th December, 1798, addressed to Mr. Kilpatrick, or his successor, the minister of the congregation at Trenton; so that when the deceased came away from America Mr. Kilpatrick was the minister. It is impossible then that the Court can venture to place the least reliance on the pretended declarations deposed to by King, M'Ginley, and Davis, which are quite at variance with the circumstances stated in the letters of 1798. Other circumstances, if more were ne-[240]-cessary, falsify the story of these witnesses. They speak of Robert having attended Armstrong's chapel, and of Armstrong having baptized his children; but here is Armstrong's answer to Bowring, that he had done duty at Trenton for fifteen years only, viz. from 1784 to 1799, had not only no recollection of the family of the Rutherford's, but that after a considerable enquiry he could obtain no information respecting them. Two of these witnesses speak of the brother James being at Trenton, and of one of Robert's daughters residing with him. Now this James Rutherford of Trenton was quite a different person from the uncle of the party in the cause; for James, the son of James, and uncle of the party in the cause, who was lame, fond of painting, and was non compos, died a bachelor in Ireland, and never was in America. Upon the whole I cannot venture to give any credit to witnesses deposing to declarations in the manner that they have done. Without, therefore, going more minutely into this case, I am not satisfied that there is proof of the claimant's interest, and I must pronounce against it.

The King's advocate prayed costs; at least a sum nomine expensarum. Matthias and Others v. Maule and Farmer, 1829, Trin. Term, 3d Session.

Per Curiam. There is property in the hands of the Crown sufficient to meet the expences of this suit. The case set up is one of much suspicion, but, unless I were quite satisfied that it is a complete fabrication, I should not accompany a sentence in favour of the Crown with a condemnation in costs.

No costs.

[241] BOWLES v. HARVEY. Prerogative Court, Trinity Term, 4th Session, 1832.—A party having, after a lapse of thirty-five years, called for an inventory and account of an insolvent estate, the executor, who appeared under protest, dismissed with costs.

Ann Bowles died in 1797, a widow, leaving three children; and in the same year her executor, Harvey, took probate of her will under 600l.: the estate was insolvent, and the creditors accepted 10s. in the pound under an arrangement made with them at the time by a solicitor and an auctioneer, when the affairs were settled; the solicitor was dead, and the documents were lost. Henry, one of the children, now nearly forty years of age, called upon the executor for an inventory and account. The executor appeared under protest.

Addams in support of the protest. When there are fair reasons to induce the Court to conclude that the estate has been duly administered, it will dispense with an inventory and account. The estate was insolvent, and the son, who now applies, attained his majority in 1813.

The King's advocate contrà. An appearance under protest is irregular, the usual and regular course is to appear absolutely and pray to be heard on petition. It is part of the executor's oath, in taking probate, to render an inventory and account.

Per Curiam. This seems to me a very vexatious proceeding. It is impossible now to make out an inventory: the papers are all lost—the transaction is by-gone; [242] and there is no reason to suppose that the executor is in possession of any of the testatrix's property. That the executor in this case was not liable to be called upon is, I think, a fair ground of protest. I am of opinion that these proceedings ought not to have been commenced, and I dismiss the executor with costs.(a)[1]

Protest sustained.

HIGGINS v. HIGGINS. Prerogative Court, Trinity Term, By-Day, 1832.—In a case of inventory and account brought by a legatee, a declaration (instead of an inventory) setting forth desperate debts due to, and larger debts due from, the estate, but annexing no vouchers nor accounts, held sufficient after a lapse of seventeen years. In such a suit the Court cannot decide whether debts alleged to be due from the estate are a legal set off. Semble, that in a cause of subtraction of legacy the legatee, on giving security to refund, would be entitled to recover his legacy.

On petition.

This was a case of inventory and account brought by Joshua Higgins, a nephew and legatee in 100l. The petition, in substance, alleged that Benjamin Higgins died on the 11th of January, 1815, and on the 11th of March his widow proved his will as executrix; that the petitioner's legacy had not been paid; that in the declaration, instead of an inventory, the executrix alleged various debts due from officers to her late husband while in the Commissariat department, but that, save as to a few names, she was unable to specify them; and that the whole of such debts were desperate; that the deceased died indebted in upwards of 600l., no part of which debts (which were set forth) had been paid; but "the accountant craved leave to retain sufficient assets to pay the same, if entitled by law so to do." The petitioner further stated that there were no vouchers nor accounts in proof of the alleged debts, which he denied to exist; but that even if there were debts, it was not compe-[243]-tent for the executrix, after seventeen years had elapsed without any steps taken by the creditors to recover against the estate, to retain assets for an indefinite period and thus defeat the legatee's claim, wherefore he prayed the judgment of the Court to that effect, prior to the institution of proceedings in the Court of Arches.

On the other hand it was prayed that the Court, on reference to the declaration as an inventory and account, would dismiss the executrix.

Addams for the legatee.

No counsel was heard for the executrix.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. The Court cannot interfere in this matter. The testator died in 1815, and now, after an interval of seventeen years, an inventory and account has been called for, and I am of opinion that the demand has been sufficiently complied with; for although this lapse of time is not an absolute bar to a disclosure of the deceased's assets, yet after a delay of so many years a full and particular inventory and account cannot reasonably be expected or required, and therefore a declaration has been substituted and produced. It is not alleged that there are any omissa in the declaration; some debts are stated as yet due to the estate, but they are averred to be desperate; it is also stated that debts of the testator far exceeding the assets are yet unpaid, and on this account the executrix claims a discharge from the present demand. She has made a disclosure, and, under the circumstances, a sufficient disclosure, of [244] the testator's estate, and that is all that this Court can do to enable a legatee, if he be so advised, to take further measures. An administrator may be compelled to proceed to make distribution,(a)[2] but this is a different case, and the party is not entitled to call upon this Court to decide whether debts not yet paid but alleged to be due can properly form a set off to the present claim. Even if I were to give an opinion upon the matter, the Court of Chancery might be resorted to, and that Court might give a different opinion. Were there, indeed, a mutual consent and agreement between the parties, then this Court might be induced to enter into a consideration of the point and give its decision upon it. Being, however, of opinion that this petition is quite unnecessary and for a purpose not to be decided in this Court, I shall dismiss the executrix; the legatee might have applied, in a cause of legacy, to the Arches Court or to a Court of Equity; but I may go so far as to say that the executrix is bound to pay the legacy upon condition that the legatee gives security to refund, in case the amount of his legacy is required in discharge of debts.

(a)[1] See Pitt v. Woodham. 1 Hagg. Ecc. 247.
(a)[2] See Younge v. Skelton, 3 Hagg. Ecc. 780.

Executrix dismissed.

[245] WARGENT v. HOLLINGS AND OTHERS. Prerogative Court, June 28th, 1832.—Where a will is not traced out of the deceased's possession, but is not forthcoming, the presumption of law is that he destroyed it (though that presumption may be rebutted by proof), and the presumption requires stronger evidence to rebut it when a charge of spoliation is made. The evidence establishing that the deceased had possession of, and access to, his will, and might have destroyed it, and the presumption of law not being rebutted, a copy pronounced against.

This suit respected the will of William Pennell, late of Yarkhill, in the county of Hereford, yeoman. He left property, real and personal, amounting together to about 5000*l*. His will was not forthcoming, and in order to propound a copy thereof a decree to see proceedings, at the instance of a nephew and two nieces of the deceased, and as such three of the residuary legatees under the will, was served in January, 1831, upon the executor, and upon Mrs. Wargent, widow, Mrs. Gammond, and Mrs. Hollings, the deceased's sisters, the parties entitled in distribution under an intestacy.

An appearance having been given for Mr. Hollings and his wife, an allegation propounding a copy of the will, and in effect charging that the original had been wilfully destroyed or suppressed by Hollings, was admitted, and eleven witnesses were examined upon it; an allegation responsive was also admitted, and upon it were examined thirteen witnesses. On the 5th of July (the by-day after Trinity Term, 1831) "publication was decreed, the cause assigned for sentence, on the first assignation, on the caveat-day in August, both proctors declaring they gave no allegation, unless exceptive to witnesses. On admission of such exceptive allegation, if any, the same time."

This assignation and the certificate of the de-[246]-cree to see proceedings were continued (at the petition of the respective proctors) on the several caveat-days to the first session of Michaelmas Term, when the proctor for Hollings tendered an allegation exceptive to two witnesses, and prayed to be heard on admission thereof the next Court; this was objected to by the other side, on the ground that the period had gone by within which it was competent to bring in an exceptive allegation. "The Court permitted the allegation to be brought in (which was done accordingly), reserving the consideration, as to its admission, to the hearing of the cause; and assigned the cause for informations and sentence on the next session."

From this decree Hollings appealed to the Court of Delegates. An appearance was given under protest, alleging (after setting forth the assignations of the 5th of July, and subsequent thereto) "that the exceptive allegation was permitted to be brought in, subject to, and only upon, the express condition that the question as to whether the same should be admitted to proof should stand over until the hearing of the cause; that the proctor for Hollings having taken the benefit of the said order, by bringing in his allegation, was not at liberty to complain by way of appeal from the express condition upon which only the allegation was permitted to be brought in, wherefore it was submitted that he had perempted his appeal and was not at liberty now to prosecute the same." To this it was replied, on the other hand, that the allegation (not being precluded by any law or regulation whatever) was duly tendered [247] and brought in without being subject to any condition as alleged.(a)

On the 30th of May, 1832, before Mr. Baron Bayley, Mr. Justice Patteson, Mr.

(a) The substance of the minute of Court made on the occasion referred to, viz. on first session of Michaelmas Term, is printed above.

Justice Alderson, Doctors Burnaby, Gostling, Dodson, Blake, and Haggard, this protest, after argument by Lushington and Addams in support, and by the King's advocate and Phillimore contrà, was overruled.

The question as to reserving the admission of the exceptive allegation was next argued; and the Court were prayed, on behalf of Hollings, to retain the cause and assign a time to hear as to the admission of the allegation. The Court, however, pronounced against the appeal, Mr. Baron Bayley observing: "Such a reservation, as forms the present ground of complaint, may be very convenient and advantageous to both parties; the object of it is to prevent delay and expence, and the Court of Appeal must be cautious not to infringe, in such a matter, on the discretion of the Court below. Should the Prerogative Court, at the hearing of the cause, think the exceptive allegation material, it will direct it to be debated, and should it then be rejected, then the Hollings's will have the liberty of exercising a power of appeal from that decision."

The cause was remitted without costs; and it was argued without the exceptive allegation being debated.

[248] Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. The question in this case arises on the will of William Pennell, who died on the 4th of July, 1829, leaving three sisters, co-heiresses of his real estates and the only parties entitled in distribution to his personal property if he shall have died intestate.

The will, a copy of which is propounded, bore date on the 11th of June, 1829; its contents need not be stated in minute detail, but it gave to Samuel Wargent, one of the deceased's nephews, a very preponderating interest. The original will was deposited, together with the probate of his father's will, in a desk in the deceased's sitting room. On a search being made after his death, the probate of the father's will was found in the desk, but the deceased's will could not be discovered; and Mr. Hollings, the husband of one of the sisters, declared that it had been burnt by the deceased in his presence on the 16th of June. A copy of the will had however been made by the solicitor the day after the execution. Proceedings were instituted at common law against Hollings on a charge that he had destroyed the will without the knowledge of the deceased. The bill was found by the grand jury; but it must always be remembered that this is on ex parte evidence only. The indictment was traversed, and the case was ready for trial when a compromise was entered into: Hollings was acquitted as a matter of course, no evidence having been offered on the part of the prosecution: by that compromise it was agreed that administration should be granted to the three sisters as if the deceased were dead intestate, but the administration was not actually [249] extracted. At length other legatees (who were not legally bound by the compromise) set up the copy of the will alleging that it was destroyed without the knowledge or privity of the deceased. I have adverted to these circumstances in order to account for the late period at which this investigation was commenced, viz. the latter end of 1830 or the beginning of 1831, but in no other respect do they bear materially on the matter to be decided by the Court, which decision must be guided solely by the evidence before it, and must be determined upon the principles of law applicable to such a case.

The question is whether the will was destroyed by the deceased himself, or whether it was destroyed without his privity or approbation. In the former case the paper is revoked, in the latter a copy may be established.

In case the will was in the custody or power of the testator, or rather, unless it appears that it was not in his custody or power, the presumption of law is that the destruction was his own act: and that presumption must be repelled by the party setting up the copy; he must shew negatively that the deceased had no opportunity, or that he was incapable of destroying it, or he must establish a strong combination of circumstances leading to a moral conviction that he did not himself destroy it; or he must shew positively that the instrument was in existence since the deceased's death, or that it was destroyed in his life time by some person without his privity or approbation.(a) An additional presumption is brought to bear against the paper, if any individual is charged with the [250] guilt of a fraudulent spoliation —in such a case the charge must be clearly established; and if the proof remain doubtful the presumption of innocence must turn the scale.

(a) See Lillie v. Lillie, and cases there cited and referred to, 3 Hagg. Ecc. 184.

In the present case it will appear that the party propounding the copy must rebut this double presumption; first, that the deceased himself destroyed the will; secondly, that Hollings, the party charged, has not been guilty of a fraudulent spoliation. In this view of the case, and if these principles be correct, the evidence presents no great difficulties.

That the deceased executed the will in question on the 11th of June is not denied, and the time of its destruction is fixed on the 16th, in the presence of Hollings and of no other person. There are some circumstances not wholly undeserving of attention which shew a change of mind in the testator, and a departure from his original intention as to the disposal of his property. He had attained to a considerable age—upwards of sixty—and had never before made a will; he had been ill for some days and yet had not expressed any anxiety to make a will, nor any wish to settle his affairs. The state of his family, consisting of three sisters, for neither of whom, if he was not on exactly equal terms of intercourse with all, had he any decided preference or disaffection, raised no very strong wish, obligation, or duty to die testate. The law would not make an inequitable distribution of his property. The parties about him—the Wargents and the Hollings'—were both anxious to prevail upon him to make a will, in the hope of securing to themselves a larger share than the law would allot. This is proved by Mr. Abell, a witness examined on the part of [251] the legatees. This witness, who is perhaps the strongest witness in favour of the sister, Mrs. Wargent, was particularly intimate with the deceased, and was one of the trustees under his will. On the 12th interrogatory he thus deposes: "I have said that Mary Wargent, before the will was made, asked me to recommend her brother (the deceased) to make a will, and that the fact was that Mrs. Wargent wanted a will made her way, Hollings one his way, and the others the same, and that the old man (the deceased) would consequently have had no will himself."

So that it clearly appears from the evidence of this confidential friend of the deceased that both parties were anxious to obtain a will, each in his own way, but the deceased being close and uncommunicative, both were afraid to propose it, lest by a personal application they should defeat their own purpose. Again, the Rev. Mr. Powell calls on the deceased and finds him very ill—"a dying man." On this occasion Mrs. Wargent induces him to mention to the deceased the propriety of settling his affairs, but the deceased declined; "he said, No, no, I can't yet, I must leave it till after Christmas." The witness then proceeds in this manner: "I added, 'I am afraid you will not live till Christmas. Who is your attorney?' He replied, 'Mr. Owen.' I said, 'Shall I send for him, as I would do any service to you or the family?' He said, 'No, I will put it off till Christmas.' I again said, 'You had better not, better do it at once, to prevent disputes; shall I send for Mr. Owen?' He replied, 'No, I will think of it.' I went to Mrs. Wargent and told her I could not prevail on her brother to make his will. I did not see the deceased again."

[252] Here there is no wish to make a will: though urged he declines, and will not allow his solicitor, Mr. Owen, to be sent for, but says he will defer it till Christmas; the deceased then was not originally anxious to do any testamentary act, the wish does not originate with himself. Even to Abell, his confidential friend, his executor and trustee, he seems scarcely to have mentioned the subject. On the 4th article he says: "The deceased never told me but once that he had an intention of making his will, and that was on the 9th of June [two days before the execution], and then he did not say particularly that he did not mean to die intestate, but merely that he had sent for the lawyer to make his will."

Mrs. Wargent, who was constantly in the house, has frequent opportunities of getting persons to suggest to the deceased to make his will, and it is her son who on the 9th of June requests Mr. Owen's attendance to make the will. The making of it is one single transaction, it is "beat out at one heating," the instructions are taken, the draft is prepared, the will ingrossed, executed, and attested before the solicitor leaves the house on the 11th of June. The deceased was perfectly capable: there is nothing to affect the validity of the instrument as then made; but a will thus prepared and executed is much more to be reconsidered, to be altered, and to be departed from, than an instrument the result of long previous consideration, confirming former dispositions of the same import, and sustained by previous declarations of intention. These circumstances tend to remove any strong improbability that the testator should afterwards alter or wholly revoke the paper.

[253] The will is certainly very much in favour of the Wargents. The real property, whether he possessed it in fee or in tail, would under an intestacy go between his three sisters as co-heiresses. The gift of it then principally to Samuel Wargent is, pro tanto, a disinherison of the three sisters. It is not extraordinary, therefore, that Hollings, who is one of the executors and trustees—the husband of one of the sisters and who had several children—should be dissatisfied. It is probable enough, and might almost be affirmed, that he or his wife would have represented to the deceased that the disposition deprived them of their fair share of his property; and some of Hollings's declarations, spoken to particularly by Abell, are not creditable to him and may have tended to excite suspicion. On the 10th article Abell thus deposes: "After the will had been executed and Mr. Owen had gone away, Hollings asked me to ask the deceased how he had made his will. I said I would do no such thing, that he might go himself, for he was the properest person, as he was Mr. Pennell's brother-in-law: he did go up: we left the house together, and on our way home I asked him if the will were to his satisfaction; he said 'it was not, that he did not like it at all, and that it ought to be burnt:' he was very angry, and numbers of times said it ought to be burnt, 'and that it should be burnt if ever he got hold of it;' he told me that he had learnt from the deceased that he had left all the property which he had got from his father to Samuel Wargent, and he vowed that 'he would destroy the will if ever he got hold of it,' over and over again."

These declarations infer that Hollings was dis-[254]-satisfied, and that at the moment of disappointment, and when much irritated, he would not be very scrupulous as to the means he should resort to for the purpose of getting rid of this obnoxious paper. Such declarations may affect his character, but they do not fix on him the intention of committing spoliation; for had he entertained any such purpose he would not have communicated it to this witness. Fraudulent acts are generally done secretly and clandestinely, and Hollings must have known that it would have been no less the duty than the inclination of Abell to defeat any such attempt.

But had the deceased an opportunity of destroying the will after it was made? Owen, in his deposition on the 2nd article, gives this account of what followed. "I folded up the will in an envelope, endorsed it, sealed it, and asked the deceased what I should do with it; he desired me to place it in his great coat pocket which was close by; I did so, and something passed between us as to his keeping it with the probate of his father's will, and I recommended him to place it in the desk he had below in the parlour, where I knew he kept his money, and he said he should do so."

The will was accordingly deposited with the probate of his father's will by the deceased himself in his desk in the parlour: this is admitted in the answer to the 5th article, and in that desk the probate of the father's will was found, but the deceased's own will was not there.

It results, then, from the observations already made, that no great improbability exists that, upon his own reconsideration, or upon the solicitation of Hollings or his wife, the deceased might resolve either to alter or destroy his will.

[255] It is not denied, indeed it is admitted in the answers, that the deceased came down several times afterwards into the room where this desk stood, and shut the door after him: all that is denied is that he was seen to open the desk. Indeed, if one witness, Savagar, is believed, he was down on the 15th, the very day before, according to Hollings's account, he destroyed the will. She says on the 5th article: "I recollect well Mr. Pennell's coming down on the Monday after the will was made [this clearly was on the 15th]; Mr. Hardy on that day gave him the sacrament in the morning, in the evening he came down: I saw him go into the parlour, and I heard him unlock and lock his desk, and I saw him come out at once and go upstairs; as he passed I could see that he had somewhat in his hand, it looked like a memorandum book, and I thought it was some accounts he had to settle with Price, whom he was expecting, but who did not come till the next day. I do not remember seeing him go to the desk about that time only that once."

Here is evidence not only that he was able to have access but had actual access, on the 15th of June, to the place where the will was deposited, and though there is no precise identification of the will, yet it is clear he had an opportunity of carrying it upstairs on that day. If he removed it for any purpose, whether to revise or to alter, that removal is the strongest confirmation of the presumption of law that the destruction was his own act, unless it could be clearly shewn that Hollings had destroyed the will without the deceased's knowledge, or unless Hollings' declaration could be falsified by shewing its actual existence after the [256] 16th, the time when he says it was burnt in his presence. And is that declaration falsified?—quite otherwise. Savagar's evidence, which I have just read, tends to support the declaration of Hollings; and her account is corroborated by Price, who, on that very day, was engaged with the deceased in settling some accounts—therefore he was able to do such an act as the destruction of his will on the 16th.

Price says: "On Tuesday morning, the 16th of June, I found the deceased sitting in a chair in his bed-room; he was dressed as I usually saw him, I thought him better; he had a fire and complained of cold; he said to his sister, Mrs. Wargent, 'Fetch me my book, it is upon the top of my desk' [and having been down stairs at his desk on the evening before, it was very probable that he should remember exactly where the book was]. She presently brought up the right book, the deceased then calculated on the back of my bill how much I owed him, and he me, the balance was in his favour and I paid him 2l." The deceased then was able to have destroyed the will on the 16th, and the account is quite in consonance with Savagar's evidence.

Mr. Gregg, Hollings' solicitor, says on the 11th article: "It was on the 22nd of June [and he speaks from an entry in his day-book] that Hollings was at my office and informed me that the deceased had, in his presence, burnt his will. Hollings then went on to say the deceased was induced to destroy his will from what Counsellor Poole had said to him (Hollings), viz. that the law would make the best will for him and divide his property equally among his three sisters; that [257] Hollings told this to the deceased, who in consequence burnt his will in his presence; that neither Mrs. Wargent nor any one else knew about it, and that Mrs. Wargent would be much disappointed when she should hear of it. I told Hollings this might occasion disputes, and that it would be much better if some paper were signed by Mr. Pennell, or some recognition made by him in the presence of some disinterested person of such destruction; but Hollings replied 'that could not be done without Mrs. Wargent knowing it, which Mr. Pennell guarded him against, as, if Mrs. Wargent found it out, he should have no rest from her and her family until he had made another will.'" It is unnecessary now to state more of this gentleman's deposition. Hollings's communication, thus made, is certainly no evidence of the fact that the deceased himself burnt the will (and no evidence of that is required—it is the presumption of law), yet it accounts for other parts of the case, and takes off the effect of the non-disclosure either by the deceased or Hollings of this destruction of the will to Abell, who was favourable to the Wargents.

I must here notice that the truth of Hollings's story is confirmed to a certain extent by Mr. Poole, a barrister and chairman of the Herefordshire Quarter Sessions. This gentleman was acquainted with the deceased; he states that as the deceased frequently asked his opinion, he conceived it had some weight with him; he further deposes on the 7th article that on the 15th of June (previous to Mr. Pennell's death) Hollings was at his house paying him some rent, and in the course of conversation about Mr. Pennell's state of health and of his affairs "Hollings expressed dissatisfaction at the deceased's will, and also said that the deceased [258] was dissatisfied, and my reply was, 'If Mr. Pennell is dissatisfied with his will, he need not have any, the law will make a very good will for him,' and I stated in what manner. I believe I added, 'If he is really dissatisfied with his will, you had better get him to destroy it, and then the law will take its course; and you may tell him so from me;' to which Hollings replied 'he would.'"

Hollings, therefore, was with Mr. Poole on the 15th, the day on which the latter informed him how the deceased's property would go under an intestacy, and he authorized Hollings to tell the deceased, in his name, that the law would make the best will for him. What is more probable than that the deceased, having the will in his room, should, on Hollings' communicating to him (after Price was gone on the 16th) what Mr. Poole had said, have thrown his will into the fire. It is equally natural that he should not disclose to Abell what he had done, but should keep up the appearance of retaining him as his executor, and that Hollings should do so too, as Abell states he did on the 25th of June, although previous to that time he had communicated to Gregg that the will had been destroyed. This deception might be blameable, but, under the circumstances to which I have referred, it is not improbable nor inconsistent with the supposition that the deceased himself destroyed the will on the 16th. The subsequent conversation with the Rev. Mr. Hardy on the 18th is quite consistent with the deceased's having burnt his will. The witness states that on that day, at the request of the medical man, he spoke to the deceased upon the expediency of settling his affairs, and adverted to the disposition of his property which the law would make; that the deceased bowed his head [259] and made no answer; "but Mrs. Wargent, who was in the room, and was the only person with them, said, 'My brother has made his will: Mr. Owen did it.' The deceased neither affirmed nor denied that he had made his will; the witness apologized for introducing the subject, and, after a short time, went away." The deceased's silence upon the subject is in no degree inconsistent with his having destroyed his will; he wished not to have the act known either to Mrs. Wargent or to those who might officiously interfere to induce him to make another will; he avoids the discussion; he might now be satisfied with that disposition which the law would make—an equal division between his three sisters.

Under these circumstances, and upon this branch of the evidence, so far from the presumption of law being repelled, it is proved that the deceased had possession of his will, and full opportunity of destroying it, and no strong improbability exists that he should have resolved on that step.

But on the other branch of the case, is the charge of a fraudulent spoliation established against Hollings. On this point the presumption of law—that the party is innocent—is far stronger; and the fraud must be proved by far more stringent evidence.

The circumstances already noticed may be sufficient to dispose of this part of the case, but it is due to the memory of Hollings (for he is now dead) that although, Abell being entitled to credit, Hollings may have afforded some grounds for suspicion and created prejudices in the mind of Abell which may account for the tone of his evidence, yet there is no fact to fix such a fraud upon Hol-[260]-lings, but rather the reverse. There is not the slightest proof he even had possession, or attempted to get possession, of the will; he was never seen at the desk, or found shut up in the room, or in any other situation so as to create any suspicion that he was endeavouring to obtain the will. If he ever had possession of it at all, it was probably before the 22nd of June, that is, before his communication with his solicitor, Mr. Gregg. Long after that time it is admitted in the answers that the key of the desk was in the deceased's possession under his pillow, and inaccessible to Mr. Hollings without the knowledge of those about the deceased. The result of the evidence then is to negative the spoliation by Hollings. Even if it were a case of grave suspicion, if it were doubtful, he would be entitled to the benefit of that doubt in favour of his innocence against such a charge.

Upon the whole, the Court is of opinion that the presumption that the deceased himself destroyed and thereby revoked this will is not repelled; but, on the contrary, is rather confirmed by the evidence; I must therefore pronounce that, so far as appears, the deceased is dead intestate; and I decree the administration to the sister Mrs. Hollings, but I shall give no costs.

Administration was finally granted to Mrs. Gammond and Mrs. Hollings.

[261] OWEN v. OWEN. Consistory Court of London, Mich. Term, 1831.—In a suit for restitution of conjugal rights brought by the wife the husband pleaded her adultery, proved gross impropriety of conduct, absence from home (unaccounted for) on two nights; letters from her containing admissions of guilt, and endeavours to induce individuals to give false representations as to where she slept.—Separation decreed. Quære, whether the rule that a separation cannot take place on a mere confession of guilt applies to a confession in unsuspected letters to third parties.

This was a suit of restitution of conjugal rights brought by the wife, in which a defensive allegation pleading her adultery was proved.

Haggard for the husband.

Dodson and Addams contrà.

Judgment—Dr. Lushington. The charge against the wife is completely substantiated. It is unnecessary for me to inquire whether the adultery—alleged to have been committed at the husband's house, when, during his absence, the asserted paramour slept there—is fully established; but that the wife was, on the occasion to which I refer, guilty of high impropriety of conduct, is clearly proved. It is also clearly proved that on the night of the 29th of April, and of the 20th of May, 1830, the wife was absent from her husband's house, and these absences are wholly unaccounted for. If then the case of the husband rested here, the Court would be entitled to ask why, if conscious of innocence, the wife had not pleaded and proved it? Again, her own letters contain distinct admissions of guilt, and the strongest endeavours, by a subornation of perjury, to induce different individuals to make such a representation as might satisfy her husband that on the nights in question she slept where no sus-[262]-picion could reasonably attach. There can be no doubt but that these letters are perfectly genuine; and although it is a well established rule—a rule that may, perhaps, be extended to a confession by unsuspected letters to third parties—that the Ecclesiastical Court will not, on a mere confession of guilt, pronounce for a separation,(a) yet the principle upon which the rule is founded is a fear of collusion between the husband and the wife; in this case, however, there is not the slightest idea of collusion. The letters were written by the wife (while under a friend's roof) with the view of the same being secret, and in which she was exercising her ingenuity how to account for her absence, and thus allay her husband's well founded suspicions. But, independent of the wife's confessions of guilt contained in her own letters, the main circumstances of the case—her extreme impropriety of conduct while her husband was absent from home; her absence on the two nights I have already mentioned: her refusal to give any explanation as to where she passed them (it being proved that she was not with the friends with whom she had previously stated herself as engaged to visit); her anxiety also to clear herself by a subornation of perjury—are facts established by unexceptionable testimony. Every thing but the exact place where the adultery was committed (and that is not of importance) is proved. No presumption in favour of the wife's innocence remains. I am then of opinion that the allegation of the husband is established by evidence, and accordingly sign the sentence of separation.

[263] NEELD v. NEELD. Consistory Court of London, Mich. Term, 4th Session, 1831.—In a suit for separation by the wife for cruelty, where the Court is convinced that her personal safety is in jeopardy, or where it may see reasonable ground to apprehend such a consequence, it is bound to protect her: but the Court can only interfere where there is actual personal ill-treatment, or such threats as would reasonably excite in a mind of ordinary firmness a fear of personal injury. The Court—being of opinion that all the circumstances pleaded would fail, if proved, to establish that the wife could not return to cohabitation without risque to life or limb—rejected the libel.—The rule of taking the libel as true applies only to averments of fact, not to inferences which ought to be sparingly introduced.—Letters of the husband exhibited by the wife are evidence against him, and explanations therein contained of his conduct, with respect to the matter charged, are to be taken into the Court's consideration, but other statements therein are not evidence for the husband, at least in debating the plea.—A suit for restitution of conjugal rights strongly infers that at the time of instituting such suit the party had no reasonable ground to apprehend personal violence, but it does not amount to an absolute bar to a sentence of separation for antecedent cruelty; à fortiori, it would not exclude the wife from pleading acts of harshness and severity previous to such suit in conjunction with acts of cruelty subsequently.—An interdict of intercourse with her family is not cruelty to a wife, though, under circumstances, it might tend to illustrate the temper of the husband.—The contents of or extracts from written documents must not be pleaded without annexing the same; and even if the adverse counsel do not object to the non-annexation, the Court must take the objection.

[Discussed, Russell v. Russell, [1897] A. C. 395.]

This was a cause of separation promoted by Lady Caroline Mary Neeld against her husband, on the ground of cruelty.

The parties were married on the 1st of January, 1831: on the 29th of June, in the same year, a citation in a suit for restitution of conjugal rights, at the instance also of the wife, was returned into Court; a libel in the usual form was admitted on the 11th of July, and on the 14th an affirmative issue was given to it, whereupon Mr. Neeld was assigned to take his wife home, to treat her with conjugal affection, and to certify the same on the Court day—on the 4th of August. On that day it being alleged that Mr. Neeld had complied with the assignation of the 14th of July, and no objection being made on the part of the wife, the Court on the 4th of August dismissed the husband from the suit.

(a) See Burgess v. Burgess, 2 Hagg. Con. 223. Mortimer v. Mortimer, ibid. 316. Williams v. Williams, 2 Hagg. Con. 304. Crewe v. Crewe, 3 Hagg. Ecc. 131.

On the 11th of August the citation in the present cause issued, and was on the same day personally served on Mr. Neeld. A libel of forty articles was given in; this was opposed, and on the third session of Michaelmas Term the Court, after argument, directed several letters, in Lady Caroline's possession, which were not annexed to the libel, but of which extracts were inserted in the different articles, to be brought in. Nine letters were accordingly produced, and the admissibility of the libel and exhibits was further debated.

[264] The King's advocate and Phillimore for Mr. Neeld, opposed the admission of the libel.

Dodson and Addams contrà.

Judgment—Dr. Lushington. There are two points for my consideration: first, whether the libel is admissible at all; and secondly, whether, if admissible, its substance ought in any way to be altered or reformed. The suit is instituted by Lady Caroline Neeld, praying for a separation from Mr. Neeld, on the ground of cruelty, and the admissibility of this libel depends upon the solution of the question whether the facts, as set forth, which are to be taken as true, would prove cruelty. I wish it to be most distinctly understood that the only question is whether the charges laid in the libel are sufficient to justify me in eventually admitting it to proof; it being no part of my duty to comment upon the conduct of one party or the other, except with reference to the particular charges in this stage of the proceedings. I shall adhere to the example of my predecessors, in not attempting to give a definition of what is, or what is not, legal cruelty, because I think it exceedingly difficult, and it may be dangerous, for any one to lay down, in terms sufficiently clear and comprehensive, the nature of an offence which might, under different circumstances, assume so many and such varied shapes. For all practical purposes the leading principles in suits for cruelty which ought to govern the judgment of this Court have been laid down in terms sufficiently distinct.(a) [265] The main test which I must apply to the consideration of this libel is whether all the facts, assuming them to be true, with which Mr. Neeld is now charged, are of a nature and description to satisfy my mind that cohabitation can no longer subsist between the parties without personal danger to Lady Caroline Neeld. Where there is a strong conviction in the mind of the Court that the personal safety of the wife is in jeopardy, or where even it may see reasonable ground to apprehend such a consequence, it is its bounden duty to protect the wife from risk and danger.

In these suits the species of facts most generally adduced are—first, personal ill-treatment, which is of different kinds, such as blows or bodily injury of any kind; secondly, threats of such a description as would reasonably excite, in a mind of ordinary firmness, a fear of personal injury. For causes less stringent than these the Court has no power to interfere, and separate husband and wife: it is necessity alone which has conferred on the Ecclesiastical Court that power, and in a regard to self-protection alone must the exercise of that power be guided. Under any other circumstances the Court cannot put asunder those whom God has joined. This is the wise and prudent rule; were it otherwise, the time of the Court might be consumed in mere domestic quarrels. The Court has no right to consider whether a separation might not, in point of fact, be for the happiness of the parties, nor whether one party or the other has been guilty of misconduct, nor whether there has been a want of that affection which ought to subsist in the matrimonial state: for it must not be forgotten that marriage is in this [266] country considered of that sacred and binding force that parties who enter into such a connection are not for slight and unimportant reasons to separate themselves from the duty of cohabitation.

(a) See Evans v. Evans, 1 Hagg. Con. 35. Oliver v. Oliver, ibid. 351. D'Aguilar v. D'Aguilar, 1 Hagg. Ecc. 773. Westmeath v. Westmeath, and the cases there cited, 2 Hagg. Ecc. "Supplement."

When facts of the description to which the Court has adverted are admitted to proof, it is perfectly consistent with the principles already mentioned that minor circumstances should be also admitted; because, on many occasions, they may illustrate other facts; they may afford information of importance, and where the witnesses do not speak with precision, or where the evidence is not clear, they may influence the amount of alimony (if the suit be successful) to be allotted to the wife. But these circumstances must not be light or trifling; they should be of the same character as the principal charges, though not to the same extent.

It has been urged most properly that the contents of the libel are to be taken, for the purpose of argument, as true. To that position I entirely accede; and, in practice, I conceive it to be, when rightly understood, exceedingly beneficial to the suitors. This principle, however, does not go the length of supposing every syllable stated to be true. Averments distinctly pleaded as facts must be assumed to be proved; while averments of an inferential and argumentative character, and which should not be too lavishly introduced, are to be taken only as true to the extent that the inferences themselves can fairly be drawn from the circumstances pleaded as facts. In considering, therefore, the facts assumed to be true, I do not in the least anticipate what may be the answer of the husband to this libel, for, in this stage of the proceeding, I repeat I have nothing [267] whatever to do with any possible defence or explanation. I am bound to form my judgment upon the libel and exhibits.

Much discussion has taken place as to the degree of consideration the Court should give to the letters of the parties: they are annexed in supply of proof of different articles; and I apprehend that to the extent to which they support the articles they are evidence against the husband. If, in some of the letters, there are passages explanatory of his conduct, they must justly form matter for my consideration, but if there be in them circumstances not appertaining to the charges, whatever may be their effect in a future stage of the proceedings, I do not think that the Court is justified in considering, at present, those parts as evidence in favour of Mr. Neeld. I will now state as much of the case as it is necessary to advert to.

This marriage, which has turned out so unfortunately for both parties, took place in January, 1831. The cohabitation was very short, for in February of the same year a separation (the account of which is not very clearly stated in the libel, nor does it appear a matter of much importance) took place;(a) and the consequence was [268] that at the latter end of June a suit for the restitution of conjugal rights was brought by Lady Caroline herself. Mr. Neeld was assigned to take Lady Caroline back, and treat her with conjugal affection; and he submitted to the decree of the Court. From this suit for restitution the presumption is inevitable that Lady Caroline would not have sought to compel a return to cohabitation if she had had reasonable ground to apprehend personal violence. Had therefore the circumstances, alleged to have happened prior to the restitution suit, been of deeper importance and denoting personal violence, I doubt exceedingly whether any reliance could be placed on them when the conduct of the party setting them forth was so incompatible with their existence; but, however, though improbable, still it is not altogether impossible that extraordinary cases might occur in which a wife would hazard her personal safety for the sake of ulterior objects, rather than separate. I am not inclined, therefore, to say that even where legal cruelty has been committed prior to a suit for the restitution of conjugal rights, the institution of such a suit would be an absolute bar to a sentence of separation; à fortiori, I am not disposed to say that if acts happening anterior to the suit for restitution, but which are brought forward at a subsequent period, are not precisely in the nature of legal cruelty, yet still denote considerable harshness and severity on the part of the husband, they ought to be altogether excluded.

(a) This part of the case was first noticed in the 5th article of the libel, which, after pleading that from the 30th of March to the 11th of April Lady Caroline was at the house of her father, who, during such time, interfered, but without effect, to put an end to the differences between her and her husband, alleged "the said J. Neeld proposing, on the contrary, that they should live in future separate, and insisting that such proposal first emanated from Lady Caroline, contrary to the fact, save inasmuch as on one occasion during their visit at Warwick (viz. in February) the said Lady Caroline did say, in a fit of momentary irritation, when the said J. Neeld had quarrelled with her without any cause, and had used very opprobrious language towards her, that a separation would be preferable to the misery which she experienced from his conduct."

But do the circumstances set forth in the libel as occurring between the 4th and the 11th of August amount to legal cruelty? If the facts were all proved, could the Court entertain a judicial conviction that it was impossible for Lady Caro-[269]-line, with safety, to return to cohabitation? I mention the 4th of August, because on that day it is stated that Mr. Neeld certified that he had taken his wife home, in obedience to the commands of the Court; and unquestionably, if Lady Caroline had then to complain of grievances, even though of a minor description, and not amounting to legal cruelty, it would have been perfectly competent to her to have alleged them.

Among the charges to which I shall advert it is pleaded that Lady Caroline was interdicted from certain intercourse with her own family: but the Court does not consider itself called upon to pronounce any opinion respecting that prohibition, because although, taken in conjunction with other circumstances, it might tend—supposing there was no adequate excuse for it—to illustrate the temper of the husband, yet I cannot hold that, standing alone, it is a substantive act of cruelty. Then with respect to Mr. Neeld's conduct on the evening of the 9th of August, in slamming down the wooden apron of his cabriolet when Lady Caroline had taken her seat, to her personal injury, and to her great terror and alarm, as set forth in the thirty-first article, it is not pleaded that this was done with the intention of personal violence. But, before determining upon the real effect which this act ought to have upon the mind of the Court, I will advert to other articles. The 32nd article pleads that on the evening of the 10th of August Lady Caroline expressed a wish to pass that evening at her father's, whereupon Mr. Neeld said that she should stay at home, and that "unless Lady Caroline Neeld would promise so to do, he would lock her up." This, unless there was a strong provocation on the part of Lady [270] Caroline, of which the Court knows nothing, might justly call for reprobation. Lady Caroline declines to give any such promise; and this proves to my mind that she did not entertain any fear of personal violence from her husband. In consequence of this refusal on her part he leaves her at Coulson's Hotel, in the sitting room with the door locked: and in the 34th article it is pleaded "that on the same evening, after two hours' absence, Mr. Neeld returned, and that Lady Caroline, upon hearing his voice, withdrew into the bed-room, and bolted the door, and that he endeavoured, but without effect, to break it open." This, though very inconsiderate, does not carry with it any personal violence. The article then proceeds to state "that soon after, Lady Caroline came out into the sitting room, expressed to Mr. Neeld her determination to go to her father, and proceeded towards the door of the sitting room, which was open at such time, when one of the waiters took hold of her and pushed her back, and, on her telling him that he had no business to touch her, he replied that he did so by order of Mr. Neeld; that Mr. Neeld then came to the door and dragged his wife back to the sitting room with great force and violence, saying she might take herself off the next day where she pleased, but she should not go out that night."

The 35th article alleged that at eleven o'clock the same evening (10th of August) Lady H. Corry came to Coulson's Hotel, and remained some time; that, on Lady Caroline accompanying her said sister to the door, Mr. Neeld again caught hold of her, pulled her back with such force and violence as occasioned her great pain, and that the marks and bruises created thereby were seen by many [271] persons, and were visible for several days. It is from this article that I have entertained a doubt whether, assuming that the whole libel was established by evidence, without the possibility of excuse—except such excuse as might proceed from the statement of Lady Caroline herself—I can arrive at this conclusion, that Lady Caroline cannot return to cohabitation without risk of personal violence. The consideration of this article opens a wide field of argument. It is not alleged that Mr. Neeld excluded Lady Harriett Corry from having access to her sister Lady Caroline; it is not alleged that there was any threat of personal violence, nor any intentional blow. It does then appear to me, upon mature consideration, that, assuming the whole to be proved, I cannot come to a conscientious conviction that Lady Caroline Neeld may not return to cohabitation without risk to life or limb; and if I cannot arrive at that conclusion, giving as large a latitude as possible to the effect of this plea, it is my bounden duty

—a duty from which I must not be deterred—to reject this libel. Short of personal violence, or reasonable apprehension of it, I have no authority to interfere; the law has given me no such power; and, as I think, upon the wisest principle has restricted and limited the authority which I exercise; and in the exercise of that power I am satisfied that this libel ought not to be admitted.

This being the opinion which I entertain, I am relieved from the irksome and painful task of entering into the minute particulars which have been set forth with so much detail in the prior parts of this case; and I readily spare myself a labour which, as it cannot benefit the parties, need be no part of my duty; but I think [272] that I should shrink from discharging that duty if I did not say that I lament that some of the most important rules of pleading in this Court have not been adhered to with that degree of strictness which is most beneficial to the cause of justice and to the interests of the suitor. I cannot help thinking that many circumstances have been introduced into this case of a nature so trivial that it is impossible they could have any weight. Too great a liberty also has been indulged in in pleading inferences and arguments, for without pretending to say that they could be altogether excluded, I must observe that the argumentative parts of this plea are longer and more extended than I ever remember. So as to the necessity of annexing written documents,(a)[1] the conviction of my mind of the extreme importance of adhering to the rule that where there is a written document it shall be produced, has acquired additional strength from the present proceedings: and it is not, whether the counsel on the one side or the other takes the objection—the Court itself takes the objection, for it cannot adjudicate a case on that which is not legal evidence.

It remains for me now only to say, and to make myself most distinctly understood in this last observation, that I decide nothing between these parties, save that in my judgment the charges brought forward in this libel do not amount to legal cruelty; that, if true, they would not justify me in making a decree of separation. The conduct of either party—the blame to be attached to one or the other—are circumstances which it is not my province to consider. I abstain from all observation upon the conduct of either; I give no opinion upon it; and I wish it again to be distinctly under-[273]-stood that, in rejecting this libel, I impute no blame either to Mr. Neeld or to Lady Caroline. I feel it my duty to dismiss this suit; and, though I have bestowed upon the question much painful consideration, I cannot bring my mind to think that in adopting this course there are any grave reasons to make it doubtful that I am acting most in accordance with the established law of these Courts, and eventually for the benefit of all parties; since nothing can be more injurious to them than a suit which should, unnecessarily, be the subject of a protracted public discussion.

Libel rejected.

NEIL v. NEIL. Consistory Court of London, Mich. Term, 3rd Session, 1832.—The reduction of the husband's income, by unprofitable speculations, is no ground for a proportionate reduction of permanent alimony allotted twenty years before.

[Distinguished, Hall v. Hall, [1915] P. 109.]

On petition.

This cause respected a reduction of permanent alimony. It was originally a suit for separation by reason of the husband's cruelty and adultery. In July, 1813, a sentence of separation, on both grounds, was signed. The husband was a tailor, and upon an income from his business of 967l. per annum, permanent alimony, at the rate of 200l. per annum, was allotted to the wife. It was stated, in the present proceedings, that this alimony had been constantly in arrear, and had occasioned frequent litigation; and that in March, 1832, when the monition for payment of alimony was served, there were due to the wife 270l., and on the fourth session of Trinity Term the Court decreed, with the usual monition, 100l. to be paid [274] on account of alimony. The prayer of the husband's petition was that the original allotment of permanent alimony might be moderated.(a)[2]

Addams for the husband.

Dodson contrà.

(a)[1] See Croft v. Croft, 3 Hagg. Ecc. 317.

(a)[2] See De Blaquiere v. De Blaquiere, 3 Hagg. Ecc. 322.

Judgment—Dr. Lushington. It is admitted, on the part of the husband, that all arrears and costs should be paid; the only question is whether any reduction in the general alimony should take place. In decreeing alimony in 1813 I have some recollection that Lord Stowell, upon being pressed to give a larger sum, observed that if he could think that the wife would be able to obtain it, he would make a more ample allowance, but that the allotment of 200l. a year he considered would be most beneficial to her: and the difficulties she is stated to have experienced in respect of her alimony seems to bear testimony to the propriety of that decree. This order of alimony was made in 1813, and I am not prepared to say that after such an interval, on account of a mere reduction of the husband's income, there should be necessarily a corresponding reduction of the alimony of the wife.

How has the reduction of income, on the part of the husband, been occasioned? It is manifest that he was, at one time, in possession of a large capital; and if he has thought fit to enter into speculations, purchasing Mexican bonds, and shares nearly to the amount of 7000l., it becomes a matter of grave consideration whether, because [275] these investments happen for the present to be unprofitable, the wife—who is now increasing in years, and who, it must be remembered, is quite incompetent to contradict the statements of the husband as to his property—should suffer a reduction of alimony. Taking the husband's income, without making an allowance for the profits of his business, to vary from 350l. to 450l. per annum, I see no reason to moderate the original allotment of alimony; the husband has still the power of continuing it; and if he chooses to speculate he must, if unsuccessful, bear the inconvenience. I direct the arrears and costs to be paid; and shall not make any alteration in the decree of 1813 for the allotment of permanent alimony.

SMITH AND MOZE v. KEATS. Consistory Court of Rochester, March 7th, 1833.—The governor of Greenwich Hospital, founded in 1694, and part of an ancient royal demesne, to which an unconsecrated chapel, chaplains, and a burial-ground are attached, but the officers of which occasionally bury, christen, marry, have pews at, and resort to, the parish church, and vote at the vestry, is liable to be assessed to church-rate for premises in his beneficial occupation as governor, these premises having never been so rated before, but no valid ground of exemption being shewn to found a prescription.

This was a suit brought by the churchwardens of Greenwich against Sir Richard Goodwin Keats, for a church-rate assessed upon the house, garden, and premises, in his occupation as governor of Greenwich Hospital. The rate was made according to the assessment to the poor-rate.(a)

On behalf of Sir R. Keats an allegation, in opposition to this demand, pleaded, in substance, that from time immemorial the manor of Greenwich was a royal demesne; that the palace, formerly standing there, was a royal residence from the time of Edward IV. to [276] Charles II.; that the apartments occupied by Sir Richard Keats formed part of a palace begun by Charles II., and which, with the ground adjacent, was in 1694 conveyed by King William and Mary, by letters patent, to certain grantees, their heirs and assigns, for ever, to be holden of the Crown, in free and common socage, and without rent, as a royal hospital for seamen; that commissions of the same tenor were granted by successive sovereigns; and in 1775 the commissioners and governors became, by letters patent, a body politic and corporate, and so remained till dissolved by 10 Geo. 4, c. 25, which vested the corporation estates in certain commissioners, and the general control over the hospital in the Lords of the Admiralty. That the hospital, whilst used as a palace, and ever since, has had a chapel, two chaplains, and a burial ground; that no rent is paid by the officers, or occupiers of apartments in the hospital, nor had any rate for the repairs of the parish church ever been assessed upon such occupiers prior to May, 1829; that the house and premises for which Sir Richard Keats is assessed are situated within and form part of the royal hospital.

The responsive allegation, in substance, pleaded that Sir R. Keats, as having the beneficial occupancy to his own separate use of apartments in the hospital, was, by law and custom, rateable to church and poor in common with other parishioners, and that his allegation furnished no ground of exemption; that the chapel, not built until 1752, was not consecrated; that the officers and others of the hospital marry and christen at the church; occasionally attend divine service there; have had pews allotted to them in the body of the church, and vote at vestry; that the burial ground [277] was not attached to the hospital till 1707; and notwithstanding it, that officers of the hospital have been buried in the parish cemetery on payment only of customary fees for parishioners; and have at all times been and are in the exercise and enjoyment of all the rights of parishioners; that Greenwich church was one of Queen Ann's churches; was built of stone, and, until of late years, the church-rates had not been sufficiently burdensome to render it peculiarly incumbent on the parish officers to look for contributions to the church from every species of property liable to be rated. That from 1760 to 1807 the hospital, by agreement, paid an annual sum in lieu of poor and highway rates due in respect of the several officers' apartments and other buildings, grounds, and premises situate within the precincts of the hospital; that from 1807 till 1829 the hospital compounded for those rates by paying in one sum a seventh of the whole monies to be collected from the parish, generally, in respect of such rates; and that partly owing to these arrangements, the officers' apartments not being inserted in the other parochial assessments, were, till 1829, omitted to be inserted in the church-rates. That by the 3 Geo. 4, for building a new church at Greenwich, the rates for the support and service thereof are made chargeable on every person assessable for and towards the relief of the poor of the parish; that such rates were made according to the act; and that Sir R. G. Keats, and other officers of the hospital occupying apartments therein to their separate uses, have duly paid their respective assessments.

(a) As to the adoption of a poor-rate to regulate a church-rate, see Lambert and Simpson v. Weall, supra, 96.

The admissibility of these allegations was argued in Michaelmas Term.

[278] The King's advocate and Dodson for Sir Richard Goodwin Keats.

Phillimore and Addams contrà.

Judgment—Dr. Lushington. I have thought it necessary to take a considerable time to deliberate upon this case with a view to ascertain whether there are any authorities that bear upon the question, and I have anxiously investigated the reports and all institutional writers that might be expected to touch upon the subject; but the result of this investigation has been that I find myself without any material assistance. I cannot discover, either of principle or of decision, any thing that more than very remotely and imperfectly affects the present case.

The question I have to decide is whether or not Sir Richard Keats is liable to be assessed to a church-rate of Greenwich parish, in respect of premises in his occupation as governor of Greenwich Hospital, viz. for a house rated at 150l. per year, a coach-house and stables at 20l., a garden at 5l., and a gardener's house and green-house at 20l. I desire it to be distinctly understood that in the observations I may deem it necessary to make it is my intention to confine myself exclusively to the point I have to decide, and that any expressions which may fall from me are not to be carried beyond the strict circumstances of the present case.

Looking to the general principles upon which questions of church-rate depend, there can, I think, be no doubt or difficulty in assuming that church-rate has existed in this country from time imme-[279]-morial; for there is no evidence that it was introduced at any particular period; nor can I find any distinct notice of its commencement.

The question, then, which I have to determine is whether the property in this case is exempted from the ordinary liability on any of the special grounds set forth in the first allegation. It is clear that all property of this description is, primâ facie, liable to church-rate, unless there be some legal ground of exemption.(a) The present is a question of exemption standing on its own grounds: and that there may be legal exemptions founded on specific legal grounds cannot be doubted. The property of the church itself is not rated by reason, as is generally alleged, that the rector is liable for the repairs of the chancel.(b) It is also stated that there are cases (though I know of no instance) in which a patron, possessed of lands, may allege that the same are by prescription exempt from church-rate, his right thereto being derived from the founder of the church. Again, it has been said that certain portions of a parish may be exempt by reason of immemorial usage, and the maintenance of a parochial chapel, though, to establish such an exemption, I incline to the opinion that something more would be required.(c) Another ground of exemption supposed to exist, though I cannot find that it has been specifically treated of in the books, is where property is held by the Crown jure coronæ.

(a) Upon the liability generally of all parishioners and all property to be taxed to a church-rate, see Degge's Parson's Counsellor, p. 207; also Miller v. Bloomfield and Slade, 1 Add. 499.

(b) See Prideaux on Churchwardens, pp. 50-58. The Bishop of Ely v. Gibbons and Goody, supra, 156.

Where property is in the King's own occupation, directly or indirectly, there can be no [280] doubt, I think, that it is exempt from church-rate. I have endeavoured to trace this part of the subject with greater accuracy, not because it bears directly upon the present case, but as an illustration of the point I have to determine, and in the hope that it might lead to some clue for my decision; but on looking to the liability of the property of the Crown, I find that a series of statutes has introduced so many alterations into the common law principle of exemption, that it is not easy to ascertain what were the privileges of Crown lands by the common law prior to the passing of the statutes. This principle, however, is clear, that property actually in the possession of the Crown is honoris gratiâ, exempt from church-rate. How, indeed, could payment of rates be enforced against the Crown? Not by distress on the personal estate of the Crown. But whatever may be the distinction as to different kinds of land, whether held jure coronæ, or otherwise, it may be a question whether the same principles and distinctions would be applicable to the circumstances of this case.

What, then, are the special grounds of exemption set up by Sir Richard Keats? Looking at the contents of his allegation, I must say that, if there is any privilege of exemption in favour of Greenwich Hospital, by reason of the property, which now forms its scite, having belonged to the Crown, it stands exclusively on the ground of its being parcel of a royal demesne. It seems necessary, therefore, to consider whether such privilege of exemption, assuming it to have existed, continued after the property had passed from the Crown to the hands of the commissioners; and whether the peculiar circumstances of its appropriation to public use make any and what difference. I feel [281] considerable difficulty in holding, as a general principle, that the privilege of exemption from church-rate, which undoubtedly attaches to a royal demesne so long as it continues in the occupation of the Crown for its own use, subsists and continues upon the transmission of the property from the Crown. I lay out of present consideration the peculiar mode of appropriation: I am dealing with the general proposition—whether property of royal demesne transferred to another party ought to retain its privilege of exemption from church-rate. That the exemption would continue has not been attempted to be very strongly argued; and when I look at the consequences, if the affirmative could be maintained, I should view it with a considerable degree of alarm, for it would necessarily follow that all the lands in the country which had ever been royal demesnes, and which had been from time to time transferred to individuals, to bodies corporate, or to sole corporations, would be exempt from church-rate. The consequences of such an exemption would be most injurious to the public at large, for it would throw an additional burden upon those who have to contribute to church-rate. I cannot find any position of law which tends to sustain so injurious a proposition; on the contrary, I think it clear that the moment the property passes from the Crown to other hands the privilege of exemption is lost.(a)

If, then, I have arrived at this point, that royal possessions lose their privilege of exemption upon a transmission to the hands of individuals, the next consideration is, ought the exemption to continue upon its transfer to commissioners for the [282] purpose of a royal and public hospital, by reason of the peculiarity of its appropriation. In considering this question, the Court is absolutely and altogether without authority to guide its decision, and it therefore becomes necessary to decide it by reason and analogy. I must, however, recollect, that if I am to found my opinion upon reason and analogy, and to hold, on such principles, that the buildings and premises in question are exempt, the reason and the analogy, as bearing on the present case, must be sufficient to justify me in making an exception from a common law obligation and burthen.

(c) Degge, 208; Prideaux, 58, 59; Gibson, 197.

(a) Old Windsor, or Rex v. Mathews, 1 Nol. P. L. 178, 192-4. Ld. Bute v. Grindall, ibid. 174-9, 194.

What is the state and condition of the hospital itself, and how far is it consistent with justice and equity, that it should claim entire exemption from the payment of a general church-rate? That the inhabitants of this particular hospital, consisting of disabled seamen, the objects of the charity, inmates only because they are otherwise incapable of maintaining themselves, should be rated to a church-rate, cannot be maintained. To rate them would be almost as absurd as to assess paupers in poor-houses, or maniacs in St. Luke's. All the analogies, drawn from the poor-rate cases, tend to the same conclusion: I advert to this fact because I am strengthened in my view of it by the opinion of Lord Mansfield.(a)[1] Then, if I consider analogy, so far as respects the persons received into the hospital, there is a ground for exemption: but the case assumes a different aspect when I have to determine on the liability of officers of the establishment—persons holding houses or apartments, not only for the discharge of their official duties, [283] but for the accommodation and convenience of themselves and their families. It appears from the rate itself that Sir Richard Keats occupies a house, with stables and appurtenances, garden, and green-house, the occupation of which is not merely for the discharge of his duties as governor of the hospital, but for the domestic accommodation of himself and family. In this state of things I must also assume that Sir Richard Keats and his family may resort to the parish church and partake of its rites. Assuming that Sir Richard Keats had a beneficial occupation, the law infers an ability to pay the rate: and on reason I cannot satisfy my mind that he ought to be exempted. Nothing can be more clear than that all the decisions of courts of the highest authority in respect to poor-rates and highway rates support, by analogy, the rateability of the party in this case.(a)[2]

But other grounds of exemption are alleged. It is said that there is a chapel and chaplains belonging to the hospital. Granting this, I am at a loss to understand that the existence of a private chapel is a ground of exemption from the church-rate. I know of no authority in law for that position, nor am I aware that the books furnish any case in which the mere existence of a private chapel exempts a person from the obligation of contributing towards the repair of the mother church. Again, it is pleaded that no rate has been made until 1829. I entertain some doubt whether this is to be considered a legal exemption by prescription, unless it can be supported by some valid reasons, viz. as the scite being on former church lands, or on lands belonging to the founder; or exempted in [284] some mode recognized by books of authority; but in the present case, to the year 1694, the scite had been royal demesne in the occupation of the Crown, and then, therefore, not liable to church-rate; and, supposing that no rate has been levied since 1694, one hundred and thirty-five years is not a sufficient length of time to found a prescriptive exemption: and if I were to look to the responsive allegation, I might find, in what regards the building of the new church, some clue to this non-claim upon the governor and officers of the hospital for a church-rate during the period I have mentioned; but I decide the present question without availing myself of the inferences arising from that consideration. As far, however, as the circumstances set forth in that allegation seem to me to bear, they assist my view of the case, and support the justice and reasonableness of the rate. It is, I think, quite agreeable to equity that the officers who occupy apartments in this institution, and who, as inhabitants of the parish, enjoy as such all the privileges and rights connected with the parish-church, viz. of pews, of marriage, of baptisms, and of burials, and who are themselves able to contribute towards the repairs and maintenance of that church, should be liable to assessment in their just proportions; and I must presume that the legislature, when it passed the statute for the erection of the new church, did not deem the rating of the property in question illegal, because it made the whole of it liable to assessment.

Taking, therefore, all the circumstances into consideration, I am of opinion that Sir Richard Keats is rateable for the premises occupied by him as governor of Greenwich Hospital.

(a)[1] See Rex v. Occupiers of St. Luke's, 2 Burr. 1053; Rex v. St. Bartholomew's the Less, 4 Burr. 2439. And dictum per Lord Alvanley in Holford v. Copeland, 3 Bos. and Pull. 139.

(a)[2] See Ayre v. Smallpeace, 1 Nol. P. L. 154, 178.

[285] The King's advocate then stated that it was not the intention of Sir Richard Keats to offer any further opposition to the rate; but he had thought it necessary, in the first instance, to take the opinion of the Court before the property of a public institution was burthened with the rate.

Per Curiam. The governor, as guardian of public property devoted to most useful and charitable purposes, has acted very properly in resisting the payment till the opinion of a competent jurisdiction had been ascertained upon the point.

The Court admitted the pleas; and the King's proctor, on behalf of Sir Richard Keats, declared that he proceeded no further in the cause.

Rate established.

SAMPSON v. SAMPSON. In the Commissary Court of St. Paul's, December 4th, 1832.

—Under a citation for cruelty only in a suit for separation by the wife, adultery by the husband—occurring prior to the institution of the suit, but sworn to have come recently to the wife's knowledge—may be pleaded, even though publication of the evidence on the libel and on a responsive plea is about to pass.

This suit, originally for cruelty, was brought by the wife against her husband. The marriage took place in 1810, four out of six children were living; cohabitation ceased on the 3rd of January, 1831, and on the 16th of February following the husband was cited in a suit for cruelty, and appeared. The libel was debated, and, generally admitted; when in December, the cause having in the inter-[286]-mediate time stood over under a treaty of agreement, alimony was allotted at fifty guineas per annum. On the 19th of June, 1832, a defensive allegation—denying the charge of habitual marital cruelty, explaining the specific charges, and imputing to the wife general violent and irritating conduct towards her husband—was admitted upon being reformed. Answers were taken, and witnesses examined upon these pleas, when on the 7th of November publication, at petition of the husband's proctor, was decreed to pass on the next session, unless, three days before, a copy of an allegation asserted by the wife was delivered. An allegation consisting of ten articles, pleading adultery committed by the husband in the years 1827, 1828, 1829, was accordingly brought in, accompanied by an affidavit on the part of the wife, setting forth that until this present month of November she was not informed of the fact of adultery therein pleaded; and the Court having assigned to hear on admission thereof, the allegation (together with an affidavit on either side) now came on to be debated.

Phillimore for the husband.

Dodson for the wife.

Judgment—Sir Herbert Jenner. In this suit the wife's libel, pleading cruelty, was admitted in Hilary Term, 1831. The cause was then suspended by a negotiation between the parties, which, in some measure, accounts for its not having long since been judicially determined. The present allegation, charging the husband with adultery in 1827, and subsequently, is opposed on [287] two grounds, first, that it is offered at too late a period, and that the affidavits explanatory of this delay, and in support of the allegation, are insufficient; secondly, that in a suit founded upon a citation for cruelty, a party cannot plead adultery.

Some part of this allegation is admissible as strictly responsive to the husband's plea; but another part opens a new case against the husband. It is, however, quite clear from the affidavits, both on the one side and on the other, that the wife has for some years past entertained a sincere suspicion of her husband's infidelity: this is also apparent from the libel, which in the 10th article pleads, "that on the 2nd of January, 1831, Mary Sampson having stated to her husband certain information she had received concerning him, he abused her, and called her a liar." This article refers to the criminality now imputed to the husband, and thus lays the foundation for the present allegation; the wife, however, states that the fact of adultery did not come to her knowledge till in the course of last month. Upon this part of the case it is objected that the wife has not used due diligence; and certainly, did the present matter rest upon her affidavits alone, I might have considerable difficulty in saying that they are perfectly satisfactory in that respect; yet, upon a consideration of what is disclosed in the affidavits on both sides, and has otherwise transpired in these proceedings, I am not inclined to hold that the wife is barred, by laches, from offering this allegation; and, in that view of the case, it would be of no advantage to the husband to reject it, since the charge is such that she would at least be entitled to bring it before the Court upon a new citation in a direct suit for adultery.

[288] But it is further objected that on principle the allegation is inadmissible in the present suit; such a position, however, cannot, I think, be maintained. In Best v. Best (1 Addams, 411) it was held that in a suit against the husband for cruelty a defensive allegation pleading, distinctly and substantively, adultery by the wife, was admissible without a separate citation on the part of the husband; and this practice has been since acted upon in cases which bear some analogy to the present.

In Barrett v. Barrett (1 Hagg. Ecc. 22), which has been cited, the wife was permitted, in a suit instituted against the husband by reason of cruelty, to give in additional articles to the libel pleading acts of adultery. That case is certainly distinguishable from the present, inasmuch as in Barrett v. Barrett the adultery was subsequent to the commencement of the original suit, and no witnesses had been examined. It, however, clearly disposes of the quotation from Oughton, cited by Dr. Phillimore, to shew that the citation must necessarily contain the whole charge—"causa ob quam lis instituenda sit" (Oughton, tit. 20, s. 1), since that cannot be considered as the rule of practice at this time. Upon a consideration therefore of that case, and of the doctrine in Best v. Best, to which I have referred, I see no reason why in principle Mrs. Sampson's allegation, although offered in the present stage of the proceedings, should not be admitted.

[289] REPORTS OF CASES ARGUED AND DETERMINED IN THE ECCLESIASTICAL COURTS AT DOCTORS' COMMONS; AND IN THE HIGH COURT OF DELEGATES.

IN THE GOODS OF MARY POUNTNEY. Prerogative Court, Michaelmas Term, 1st Session, 1832.—Administration to a feme coverte (after the death of her husband who survived but took no grant) decreed to her next of kin, entitled by settlement to her property.

On motion.

Mary Pountney died in 1825, without issue: her husband died in January, 1832, without having taken administration to her: on his death her only property reverted, under the marriage settlement, to her own family.

Gostling moved for an administration of Mary Pountney's effects to be granted to one of her next of kin.

Per Curiam. In the case of Fielder v. Hanger (3 Hagg. Ecc. 769) I directed [290] that, in the grant of an administration of the effects of a married woman, the representatives of the husband should be preferred, even though the husband had died without taking administration to his wife; that direction, however, was founded on the assumption that the beneficial interest vested in those representatives, and on the principle that the grant ought to follow the interest; but here, the property of the wife being in strict settlement, she left nothing to which the husband could be entitled as her representative; and accordingly, though he survived her seven years, he took no administration. Acting, therefore, in strict conformity with the principle adopted in Fielder v. Hanger, of uniting the administration to the beneficial interest, I decree the administration, in this case, to the wife's next of kin.

Motion granted.

THEAKSTON v. MARSON. Prerogative Court, Mich. Term, 3rd Session, 1832.—Where a paper is unfinished the party setting it up must satisfy the Court, first, of fixed and final intention; and, secondly, that its completion was prevented by the act of God. The strength of evidence required varies according to the progress which the paper has made towards completion. A pencil memorandum written by, and in the pocket-book of, the person who produced it, but sworn to have been written down from the instructions of the deceased, at a single interview, three days before his sudden death by apoplexy, not signed, nor ever seen or afterwards referred to by the deceased, nor led up to or confirmed by conduct, declarations, or affections, but resting solely on the evidence of the writer, pronounced against with costs; the Court holding final intention not proved, even if the evidence of the only witness, whose credit was much shaken, had been fully believed.—Quære, whether the evidence of a single witness, omni exceptione major, but unsupported by any circumstances, makes legal proof of a testamentary act.

Edward Theakston died at his house in Newmarket on the 7th of November, 1831, aged 58. His widow alleged that he died intestate, and prayed administration; while, on the other hand, a pencil writing of the following tenor was propounded:—

"Theakston's Will. Nov. 4th." "Theakston wished me to make his will, and bring it for execution on Tuesday next. His wife to have 100l. a year. Marson to be executor and R. L. with the whole of the property. Myself trustee to secure the annuity. Read this to him when I took it down. Appd."

[291] Probate of this document, as of instructions for a will, was applied for on behalf of Charles Marson, the executor and residuary legatee therein named: and its history was thus set forth in the fourth article of the allegation which propounded it: "That the testator, for about two years before his death, was in a declining state of health, but was not confined to his house, nor incapable of attending to business; that in the course of that time the Reverend William Pochin, rector of Great Cornard, Suffolk, and a magistrate for that county, occasionally, when at Newmarket, occupied apartments at the testator's house; that the testator having, on divers occasions, consulted and advised confidentially with Mr. Pochin on his, the deceased's, private affairs, and Mr. Pochin having observed the declining state of the testator's health during the last year or year and a half of his life, several times recommended him to settle his affairs, and make his will. That Mr. Pochin was at the said testator's house on Friday, the 4th of November; and the testator, having a mind and intention to settle his affairs, and make his last will and testament, went into the room occupied by Mr. Pochin, in which he was alone, and after some conversation observed that he was not well, and that he had been thinking of that bit of paper that he and Mr. Pochin had often talked about, the deceased thereby meaning the will which Mr. Pochin had several times advised him to make; and he then said 'that he hated lawyers,' and asked Mr. Pochin 'if he could make a will for him:' that Mr. Pochin said 'he could,' and taking out his pocket-book inquired of the testator 'how he wished to settle his affairs;' upon which the testator replied, 'I should [292] like mistress' (thereby meaning his wife) 'to have a hundred a year, and Charles Marson all the rest.'(a) That Mr. Pochin then advised the testator to appoint a trustee in respect of the annuity, and the testator replied 'he would leave that to him.' That Mr. Pochin then wrote down with a pencil on a leaf of his pocket-book the said instructions, meaning by the letters 'R. L.' in the [293] tenth line of the page 'residuary legatee,' and whilst writing the same made an offer of being himself the trustee, to which the testator readily assented. That Mr. Pochin, when he had finished writing the instructions, read or stated the same, or the substance thereof, to the testator, who expressed his approbation thereof, and said 'it was all right, and that, as it was too late to do it (viz. for Mr. Pochin to prepare a more formal will) on that day, and as Mr. Pochin, who intended to return home the next day, was coming over to New-

---

(a) The paper, it will be observed, also gives the property to Marson only; and Mr. Pochin, upon the fourteenth interrogatory (see page 308), says that such were the instructions, and thus supports the paper and the plea; but in his examination in chief (see note, p. 306) Mr. Pochin deposes that the wife was to have an annuity of 100l., "and Charles Marson and his children all the rest:" while Mrs. Leach deposes (page 319) that Mr. Pochin had told her that the property was left to Mrs. Theakston for life, and then to Marson's children. Mr. Pochin, in his examination on Marson's second allegation, in answer to the second interrogatory, gives the following explanation, when interrogated as to the discrepancy between the paper and the declaration deposed to by Mrs. Leach:—"In saying that the deceased had left Charles Marson and his children all the rest, I meant that if there was any residuum, it would be for the benefit of Marson and his family, and I adopted those words because they were the precise words the deceased had made use of when he gave me the instructions; as the deceased had said, after giving instructions in respect to his wife's annuity, that 'Charles Marson and his children should have all the rest,' meaning that it should be for the benefit of him and his family—not of his children in particular, but of his wife and the whole of his family. I had no instructions to name the children in the will. If the will is pronounced for, Marson will take all the rest of the deceased's property absolutely; I took that to be the deceased's intention, and, as a consequence, his, Marson's, family and children would be benefited, and it was the deceased's intention; because when I read over the instructions, as they are written in the pocket-book, to him, he never desired me to alter them. I did not state to Mrs. Leach that the deceased would 'have left all his property to his wife for life, and after her death to Charles Marson's children, as interrogate.'" market again on the following Tuesday (the 8th), he might be able to finish the business then.' Whereupon Mr. Pochin promised to prepare, from the instructions, and bring with him on that day, a formal will for the testator to execute." The remaining pleadings and facts will appear sufficiently from the judgment.

Lushington and Haggard in support of the testamentary schedule.

Adams and Nicholl contrà.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. This case, though not involved in much evidence, raises several points necessary to be separately considered and discussed. It respects an instrument set up as the will of Edward Theakston, a training groom and stable-keeper at Newmarket: he died on the 7th of November, 1831, at the age of fifty-eight, leaving a widow, but no child, nor any known relations; indeed he was supposed to have been illegitimate. His real property is stated, by the party setting up this instrument, to be worth 600l., and his personal, 5000l.; but the widow, in her answers, fixes the value of [294] the real estate at 400l., and the personal at 8000l. The paper propounded is pleaded to have been written at the deceased's house, at Newmarket, by the Reverend Mr. Pochin, in pencil, upon a leaf of his own pocket-book; and it is in these terms: "Theakston's Will, Nov. 4th. Theakston wished me to make his will, and bring it for execution on Tuesday next. His wife to have 100l. a year. Marson to be executor and R. L. [residuary legatee] with the whole of the property. Myself trustee to secure the annuity. Read this to him when I took it down. App[d]."

Such are the contents of the paper. The allegation in support of it, after giving the history which I have already stated, pleads the deceased's affection for Marson; that while employed as a training-groom in the north, the deceased had Marson as a lad under him for about eight years; that he took a fancy to him, treated him as an adopted son, and said he would leave him his property, or a considerable portion of it. The third article pleads disaffection on the part of the deceased for his wife, that she was addicted to excessive drinking, and that he wished a separation. The fourth, that he was in declining health for nearly two years, during which the Reverend William Pochin, who was much in his confidence, advised him to settle his affairs; that on Friday, the 4th of November, he gave Mr. Pochin instructions for his will, that Mr. Pochin wrote these instructions in his pocket-book, and read them to the deceased, who approved of them; and that it was then arranged that on Tuesday, the 8th, Mr. Pochin should bring over to Newmarket a will, prepared from these instructions, for execution. The fifth pleads that on the evening of Saturday [295] Mr. Pochin returned to his house, at Cornard, near Sudbury; that on Sunday, the 6th, the deceased was in better health than usual, but that on the morning of Monday, the 7th, he was seized with apoplexy, and died about two o'clock in the afternoon of that day.

The responsive allegation of the widow contradicts the charge of disaffection, and pleads that the deceased had full confidence in her; that both Marson and Pochin had long urged the deceased to make a will, but did not succeed; that the deceased trained running horses for Pochin; that on Saturday, the 5th of November, Pochin entertained a party of friends at the deceased's; that after Theakston's death on the 7th a message was sent to Pochin to inquire what should be done with his horses, when he wrote back a letter of condolence to the widow, but in it made no mention of a will or instructions. That on Thursday, the 10th, Pochin had a conversation with Mrs. Leach, the mother of the widow, but did not speak of any instructions for a will, though he stated that the deceased had, on the Friday evening preceding his death, informed him he intended to leave the whole of his property to his wife for life, and at her death to Charles Marson's children; and on that occasion Pochin declared that he had made no memorandum as to such testamentary intentions, and that he very much regretted it. That on Friday, the 11th, Pochin had an interview with the widow; offered her his assistance; looked over some of the deceased's books and papers, and proceeded to tear up some securities (representing them to be of no value) given by him in favour of the deceased, till he was stopped by Mrs. Leach: that during this interview Pochin made no men-[296]-tion of a will, nor of instructions. That, upon the widow refusing to allow the horses, the joint property of Pochin and Henry Williamson, to be removed from the deceased's premises till the account respecting the horses was settled, Pochin, on the 22d of November, wrote to Mr. Seaber, her solicitor, and then first intimated to the widow, or to any one on her behalf, the existence of the pretended will; that on the 28th the accounts were examined with Seaber, when Pochin and Williamson gave, in favour of Mrs. Theakston, a joint note, payable in six months, for 561l. 18s., as due from them to the deceased's estate; that Pochin, on the occasion of this arrangement, entered upon an explanation of his having torn the securities. It further pleads declarations of Marson, on the 12th of November, to Seaber, that Pochin had told him of the deceased's intention to leave his property, after his wife's death, either to him, Marson, or to his children; and that Pochin then also informed him that there was no memorandum in writing made on the 4th of November.(a)

A second allegation on the part of Marson denies and contradicts the declarations attributed to Pochin, and pleads that on Monday, the 7th, Pochin had told one Edwards of the existence of the memorandum in the pocket-book.

Such is the general outline and purport of the [297] respective pleas; and on the evidence taken upon them the case now comes on for my decision; presenting, as I have already stated, several points necessary to be accurately considered.

The first consideration is, What does the law require to establish an instrument of this description? The second, How far its validity is supported by probability in the disposition? The third, How far the act itself is led up to, confirmed, or corroborated by any circumstances? The fourth, Whether, if such an act be supported by only one witness, without other circumstances, that evidence will satisfy the demands of the law? The fifth, What degree of credit is due to the essential, if not the only, witness—the Reverend Mr. Pochin?

I. In the first place, then, looking at the instrument which I have already read as an unfinished and imperfect paper, written in the manner stated in the plea, there are two requisites essentially necessary, first, that the circumstances of the case, taken together, shall satisfy the mind of the Court that the instrument contains the fixed and final testamentary intentions of the deceased as to the disposition of his property: the proof of this, the first requisite, may arise, not from any one particular fact, but from all the circumstances taken together. The next requisite is, that the deceased, having the firm intention to give effect to the instrument in a more formal state, had no opportunity of proceeding to complete that intention, inasmuch as his further progress was arrested by the act of God, by death, or by some other supervening inability. These two requisites are in some degree connected together. Thus, if the internal evidence of final [298] testamentary intention is strong, if the instrument has arrived at its last stage of maturity—merely wanting the testator's signature—if there have been instructions, and a draft prepared and engrossed for execution, in such a case slight intervening circumstances, preventing the act of execution, are sufficient from whence to infer a continuance of intention and to repel any presumption of abandonment: but, on the other hand, if the instrument is in its very first stage—mere heads and outline of a will hastily given—in its first concoction—then, before the Court can come to the conclusion that the instrument contains that disposition to which the deceased had made up his mind, and is entitled to probate, not only does it require more extraneous evidence of final intention, arising from the state of the deceased's affections, from testamentary declarations, and from subsequent recognitions; but it requires more stringent and direct proof that the deceased had no opportunity of proceeding further, and that the unfinished state of the paper results from that want of opportunity, and not from any change or infirmity of purpose. In all cases the burthen of proof lies on the party setting up an imperfect instrument: the presumption is against it; that presumption varies indeed in strength according to the state of maturity at which the instrument has arrived; but still the Court can only upon clear evidence supply the want of completion.

Such are the doctrines always held by this and by other courts; and, in proof of that position, without referring to any one case, I shall state what is laid down, very correctly, in a recent publication, in which all the reported decisions [299] are collected and referred to. Mr. Williams says,(a) "Where a paper is imperfect (manifestly in progress only), not only, as in cases of unexecuted papers, must its being unfinished be shewn to have been caused by the act of God, or to be justly ascribable to some reason other than any abandonment of intention by the testator, but it must also be clearly proved by the party setting up the instrument, upon a just view of all the facts and circumstances of the case, that the deceased had come to a final resolution in respect to it, as far as it goes. Moreover, the presumption of law against such an instrument, instead of being slight, as in the case of a merely unexecuted paper, is very strong, and hard to be repelled. When there is a mere want of execution in a paper which is complete in other respects, the Court will presume the testator's intentions to be expressed in such a paper, on its being satisfactorily shewn that the non-execution did not arise from abandonment of those intentions so expressed; but where a paper is incomplete in the body of it, the Court must be completely satisfied by proof: first, that the deceased had finally decided to make the disposition of his property expressed in the imperfect paper; secondly, that he never abandoned that intention, and was only prevented by the act of God from proceeding to the completion of his will." It appears to me that the doctrine and principles as to imperfect papers are here accurately laid down, and to them it is the duty of the Court to adhere.

---

(a) The letters, note of hand, and securities, instead of being annexed, as usual, in supply of proof to the allegation, were referred to in it, as annexed to the interrogatories, administered on behalf of the widow. When the allegation was debated this was objected to as a novel and inconvenient practice; and the Court accordingly directed that these exhibits should, in conformity with established practice, be disannexed from the interrogatories, and annexed to the responsive allegation.

II. In order to support this instrument, probability in the disposition, grounded upon affection [300] and disaffection, has first been resorted to; but in judging of their effect upon the deceased and their bearing upon this case, it is not sufficient to consider those feelings loosely and generally; they must be accurately compared with the testamentary disposition itself, and applied to the particular transaction. In this point of view, the proof of the deceased's regard for Marson goes no further than this, that if he made a will, Marson would probably be remembered in it. Marson had lived under him as a lad, and was then a favourite; he had become training groom to Lord Exeter; he was still a favourite, and in the deceased's confidence; he had married Mrs. Theakston's sister, and Theakston himself had no family nor any known relations. It was then likely enough that, if Theakston set about a will, Marson would be considerably benefited. But even giving full credit to the witnesses deposing to hints to this effect, those hints are loose, distant, and unspecific; there is no declaration that Marson should be his executor and residuary legatee, and should have all his property, except an annuity to his wife; there is nothing precisely applying to the present disposition: the whole consists of general expressions of affection and regard.

Again, disaffection to the wife has also been relied upon: but is this proved? The deceased had been married about seven years, and his wife is represented as a clever, intelligent woman; she managed his household, which was large, as he boarded his stable-lads, and occasionally accommodated his customers with lodgings: she kept his books, made out his accounts, wrote his letters, and appears to have been a useful and valuable wife: she had a failing—[301] she occasionally indulged in too much liquor: she is described as naturally of a weak constitution, and it seems that occasionally after the fatigues of the day she would refresh herself, and being easily overcome, her speech betrayed her; but on the result of the whole evidence I am satisfied that some of Marson's witnesses greatly exaggerate the extent of this failing. The head lad, Hornsby, who lived many years with the deceased, and had opportunities of judging, gives, on the 7th interrogatory, this account: "Mrs. Theakston managed the deceased's household affairs, and his books; she made the bills out, and superintended his business concerns for him till his death. They lived on happy terms so far as this, he seldom or never said any thing to her, for he was a man that never quarrelled, and could not bear noise, but I do not think he was happy with her; he treated her kindly. I cannot say any thing against her treatment of him, except in regard to getting drunk: she generally had bad health, and since Christmas twelvemonth has kept her bed a good deal: her illness was all through drunkenness." This is the opinion of an adverse witness: and though the failing, to which he entirely ascribes her illness, may in some degree have occasioned it, yet the fact, to which Hornsby deposes in chief, of sleeping separately is accounted for by other witnesses from other causes, and does not mark disaffection. The deceased, when he observed this failing, probably and naturally was vexed and hurt that so good and useful a wife should ever be subject to it; but the weight of evidence is, that they lived in a state of mutual kindness and regard. There is nothing to shew, or to make it probable, that he, possessing pro-[302]-perty worth 6000l., or possibly more, should leave his widow only an annuity of 100l., scarcely the interest of one-third, though the law, in case of an intestacy, would give her one-half absolutely. The probability, a priori, is, from all the circumstances, that he would give her for life the whole of his property, however he might dispose of it afterwards, and from Pochin's declarations in the first instance that would seem to have been the disposition intended; but, by these instructions, not a legacy for her immediate wants, not the furniture nor any part of it, not the use of the house even for a time, is given to the widow. She is liable to be immediately turned adrift at the mercy of the executor and residuary legatee, till the first payment of the annuity becomes due. An examination then of the testamentary disposition (as contained in the pocket-book) of the state of the deceased's affection and disaffection I cannot by any means think tends to support this instrument as his fixed and final intention; the circumstances, to my mind, bear the contrary way.

(a) On the Law of Executors, &c. p. 53.

III. In the next place, what is there to support the making of any will at this particular time and in this mode? It may be probable enough that the deceased did not—few people do—intend to die intestate; but such a probability is far too loose and distant to sustain a transaction of this kind, and contributes very little support to the present instrument. The deceased was in ill health; he had been ailing for two years; he had a dangerous disorder—water on the chest; he had been attended by Sir Lachlan Maclean—a physician, brought from Sudbury, above twenty miles distant from Newmarket; but still there is no trace of any [303] testamentary act made or wished, or even hinted at, by the deceased himself. There were persons around him—his friend Pochin, his friend Marson—who wished, advised, nay, even pressed, him to execute a will; and, if Pochin is to be believed, Mrs. Theakston herself desired it; so that there could be no occasion for concealment if he had been willing to make a will. Whether Pochin and Marson acted in concert is not quite clear, but it admits of little doubt that both had the same object; and, as I have stated the former not only wished and advised, but even pressed, the deceased to make his will. That is a necessary inference from the evidence of one of Marson's own witnesses, Peck, who on the eighth interrogatory thus deposes:—

"Above a year before Theakston's death I met the Rev. Mr. Pochin at the Rutland Arms at Newmarket, in company with Sir L. Maclean, a physician of Sudbury, in whose temporary absence Mr. Pochin told me 'that he believed he had at last got Theakston's consent to make his will:' I remember well his expressions, and I understood from them that he had been pressing the deceased to make his will." Here, then, it appears that, a year before the deceased's death, Mr. Pochin had been urging him to make a will, and yet without success, though at that time the deceased was so ill that a physician had been brought over from Sudbury to see him; that physician also admits that Pochin wished and was anxious that the deceased should make a will, although he does not recollect that Pochin requested him to apply to Theakston on the subject, nor does it seem that he did apply. Maclean thus confirms the testimony of Peck as to this anxiety of Mr. Pochin, and Hornsby also, [304] on the same interrogatory, deposes to the same effect.

Marson, too, is equally anxious to induce the deceased to make a will; for how otherwise can his application to Mr. Seaber be explained. On the third article Mr. Seaber says: "In July or August, 1831, Marson brought me some deeds from Theakston for my opinion, which having obtained, Marson observed, 'Theakston tells me he means to come to you shortly to settle his affairs—perhaps to-morrow, but at any rate he will not be long,' or to that effect. He led me to expect him at most in a day or two: however, the deceased never came. I saw and spoke to the deceased within a day or two, but he never said a word in corroboration of such his alleged intentions, and I never had any instructions from him on the subject of his will, any more than relative to another matter on which Marson had represented that the deceased was coming to me, viz. to consult me about separating from his wife." Now, looking to Theakston's conduct, Marson could hardly have stated all this to the witness, unless he had been anxious to get the deceased to make his will; nor unless for some reason or other he thought Theakston's separation from his wife desirable.

Theakston, however, made no will, and took no steps towards a separation: he did nothing in either respect to confirm the truth and authority of what Marson had said. He not only saw Seaber, and took no notice of Marson's communications, but the fact is, that he never set about a will; though in ill health, and advised, he never expressed a wish upon the subject; and, except from Pochin and Marson, there is not a single declaration that he ever [305] was going to make or wished to make a will; there is not a scrap of paper of a testamentary tendency; not a letter referring to any testamentary intention or act; no step towards testacy, until the evening of Friday, the 4th of November, when the instrument now propounded is stated to have been written. Here is nothing to lead up to such an instrument; no previous extrinsic circumstance to support it; the deceased's conduct negatives intention; the transaction, ultimately, is begun and ended at the single interview deposed to by Pochin, pretty much in the terms of the allegation; and the whole stands on his own unsupported representation.

Mr. Pochin begins his account by deposing that he told the deceased he looked very ill, to which the deceased answered, "I am very ill;" (a) [306] and some of the witnesses, examined on behalf of the widow, do say he was looking ill: nor is it improbable that, at the end of a Newmarket October meeting, a person (who was previously ailing) keeping training stables, in which were many horses, would, from attendance and much anxiety, look ill and worn: but it is quite clear that there was no particular attack of illness which should alarm and induce him at that time to set about making a will—an act which, though [307] pressed, and at times in a dangerous state of health, he had so constantly postponed. On the morning of the 4th of November he was out and about as usual; and Hornsby, on the seventh interrogatory, gives this account of him.

(a) Mr. Pochin's evidence upon this part of the case was given on the fourth article as follows:—"I reached Newmarket on the 4th of November about half-past seven. I dined alone at Theakston's house; as soon as the cloth was taken off Theakston came into the room to talk about the match [Mr. Osbaldeston's match to ride 200 miles in ten hours] and several races, in which he was particularly interested, that were also to take place on the next day. After discussing these matters, he sitting very near the fire, and appearing dejected and ill, I observed to him, 'You are looking very ill, Theakston:' he said, 'Sir, I am very ill, and I have been thinking of that little bit of paper that we have so often talked about.' That was his phrase, and I understood him to refer to his will which I had so often suggested to him the propriety of making. Then I said, 'Really you ought to think of it, and settle your affairs:' he asked me if I could make a will: I told him, 'Oh, certainly; I can make a will, and pass all Newmarket very shortly to any one you please, provided it was your property.' I remember well those were my expressions, and he observed thereupon, 'It is too late to-night, and as you are coming on Tuesday we can do it.' It was at that time fully understood by us both that I was to go away on the next day, and come again on Tuesday to arrange some matters with him. My pocket-book, in which I had been writing a trifling memorandum, was at that moment by me on the table, and I opened it and said, 'Now, how will you settle your affairs?' he said, 'I should like mistress' (thereby meaning his wife, whom he generally called mistress in my hearing) 'to have a hundred a year, and Charles Marson and his children all the rest.' I wrote down on a blank page in my pocket-book, with a silver pencil attached, a memorandum to the effect that Theakston desired me to make his will, and to bring it over for execution on Tuesday next; his wife to have one hundred pounds a-year (meaning an annuity of one hundred pounds a-year to the deceased's wife for her life, which the deceased intended by his said expressions), and Charles Marson to be executor and residuary legatee; and I put the date, 'November the 4th.' The words I abbreviated, and as I was writing them I observed to the deceased, 'You must have a trustee; for it will not do to leave your wife to the mercy of Charles Marson;' to which the deceased replied, 'You will do for that,' or something to that effect; and I accordingly put myself down as a trustee to secure the annuity to the wife; and I added a memorandum that I had read the memorandum of such the deceased's instructions to Theakston, and that he approved of it, also abbreviating the words, for the page was so small that I merely made a rough memorandum. Immediately after writing it I read the whole of what I had so written over to the deceased, just as I had put it down, and he nodded assent, and said, 'Be sure you come on Tuesday;' I promised him that I would, and bring a will for execution by him. The deceased was a man of very few words, and nothing more than what I have related took place at that time; it was then between eight and nine o'clock at night, and he soon after left the room. No person was with us during the time."

"The deceased had bad health; for the last two years of his life he generally had a doctor to see him every evening. I did not notice any particular alteration in him during the last month of his life: I think, however, the last two months he was better. On the day before he died he was on his pony, exercising with his horses, as usual; he never missed a morning (until that of his death) some months before he died."

From the evidence, then, of this adverse witness, there seems to have been no special circumstance rendering it probable that he should at this precise period have decided to give instructions for a will.

Taking, however, the whole of Pochin's account to be true, does it satisfy the demands of the law that there was a fixed and final intention? On the contrary, is there not very much of haste and suddenness about the transaction? Is it not a mere first sketch—a mere outline and skeleton to be afterwards considered, revised, filled up, and matured? Mr. Pochin had come to Newmarket to hear the result of that day's sport, and to prepare for the next: he arrived between seven and eight o'clock; eat, at Theakston's, some cold dinner; Theakston came into the parlour and sat with him; he had several horses again to run on the next day, and Mr. Osbaldeston's noted match against time was to take place. They had these matters—to both of them very interesting—to talk over; they were both rather tired, and sepa-[308]-rated, about nine o'clock, for bed; and it is just before parting, in the last ten minutes or a quarter of an hour, that the whole of this important testamentary transaction takes place. Pochin's own account, as given on the fourteenth interrogatory, is as follows:—"The whole conversation on the subject of his will, and the writing of the memoranda, did not occupy, I suppose, more than a quarter of an hour; I am sure it did not; he was not five minutes giving the instructions, he merely saying, 'I should like mistress to have a hundred a year, and Charles Marson all the rest.' It was immediately before we parted; he went to bed, and I did the same, being tired, soon after nine o'clock. He had not at any previous time requested me to make or procure a will to be made for him; he said nothing at all upon the subject of making Marson his executor. I cannot exactly say whether, in taking down the instructions, I wrote as he dictated, or from his language, or whether I put them down in my own form of words; I should think the words were my own. I kept reading as I wrote, and he assented; and I explained to him that if he gave Marson 'all the rest,' as he called it, he must make him residuary legatee as well as executor, which he agreed to."

In this short space of time the memoranda are written in the pocket-book. Supposing that they were read over to, and approved of by, the deceased; supposing even that Pochin was requested to draw out a will from them, and bring it on the Tuesday following to Newmarket for execution, is it possible that the Court could be satisfied that they contained the deceased's fixed and final intention? That is the primary requisite of [309] the law; and I should have great difficulty, under the circumstances, in making up my mind that such a paper, so prepared, with so limited a provision for his wife, without any legacy for her immediate wants, was not written as subject to further deliberation and revision. Here seems to be, I repeat, a failure of the very first requisite—fixed intention. There is nothing that leads up to such an act of injustice to his wife; no previous declarations of it; nor is it followed by any subsequent recognition. Even, then, giving Pochin credit for the truth of what he has stated, yet considering that these instructions are written in pencil, and the other circumstances connected with them, I should not be satisfied, if the case rested here, that the Court could pronounce for the validity of this instrument.

But how far does Pochin's conduct confirm his evidence that he was actually to prepare a will, and that the memoranda were read over to and approved of by the deceased? Was there, on the evening in question, no opportunity of doing something more in this business? And if the parties had considered the disposition as finally settled, would not something more have been done? Pochin has described himself as a skilful will-drawer; he had been for two years wishing, advising, and pressing Theakston to make a will; and, if he had now got him into the humour, would he not have asked for pen, ink, and paper—have written down instructions, and obtained the deceased's signature to them? Pochin, surely, could not have been too much fatigued for that, nor was he an ignorant person, for he professes to be a ready man of business, acting very extensively as a magistrate. Pochin's conduct, there-[310]-fore tends to shew that he did not consider Theakston's mind so made up as that his will was to be drawn subject to no revision: and, as to Theakston being tired and going to bed, if Mrs. Payne is correct (and the fact comes out incidentally, and she mentions circumstances from which I think she cannot be mistaken either as to the day or to the time), he, on that Friday night, sat up an hour after the time deposed to by Pochin. She says, on the fifth article, "I sat an hour after supper with Mr. and Mrs. Theakston in their parlour: Mr. Pochin was then gone to bed. The next day (Saturday) was Mr. Osbaldeston's great match." Not a word, however, appears to have transpired about the will during this hour.

The deceased, then, was not on that night so fatigued or ill but that he could have given more formal instructions for his will, if his mind had fully been made up. On the next morning what took place? Theakston was up and about his yard as usual. Mr. Pochin, however, did not renew the subject; he did not ask Theakston if he continued of the same mind, or whether he wished to make any alteration or addition to the memoranda; no reference whatever is even suggested by Pochin himself to have been made to them. Again, on this morning there was an opportunity to write some more formal testamentary paper, for the business of the heath did not begin so early as to preclude such a matter of business; yet nothing was done; the subject was never mentioned. Pochin remained at Newmarket all the day; dined at five or soon after, but did not set off on his return home till between nine and ten o'clock. In the whole of this time the will was never adverted to; for the deceased's expression, [311] "Remember Tuesday," does not necessarily refer to it, since the arrangement that Pochin would come to Newmarket on that day had been settled before the conversation about the will, and it was upon other very important business—to have a trial of some horses.

There is, then, nothing in the conduct either of the deceased or of Pochin, as long as they continued together, to shew that they considered the will as finally settled, and that it only remained to be drawn out and executed. Indeed their conduct seems to infer otherwise, for here was, as I have pointed out, an opportunity, both on the Friday night and on the Saturday, to have done a more formal and complete act, yet nothing was done. Such being the case, would it be safe to rely upon a pencil writing—by another person in that person's pocket-book, remaining in the possession of that person, never seen by the deceased himself, without anything in affirmance of the act, not merely without anything in writing, but without anything even in conduct, in declaration, recognition, or of any description whatever confirmatory of the paper?

What, however, is the further conduct of Pochin? Does he subsequently act as if he considered that he had received final instructions to prepare a will for execution on the Tuesday? He arrived at Cornard about midnight on Saturday; he was at home all day on Sunday; and hereafter, on reference to his general conduct, it will be seen how far he was likely to regard the Sabbath so hallowed as not to do upon that day any thing of a temporal nature—he was also at home on Monday; for Edwards, who left Newmarket about one, finds Pochin, about three in the after-[312]-noon of that day, in his field, and they went to the house together. Up to that time it is not pretended that Pochin had taken any step to prepare the will—not even a rough draft or sketch had been made; the memoranda remained in his pocket-book; and yet I should infer that he was to return early on the following morning to Newmarket. Could, then, Mr. Pochin have considered (for that is the only way to view the case when the Court is examining his conduct) that the will had been finally settled, and only remained to be drawn out and executed? His conduct infers the reverse, even if his own statements are true.

Again, the account that Edwards gave to Pochin was not that Theakston was dead, but that he was not expected to live. The messenger that brought the account of his death did not arrive till about eight in the evening. Edwards deposes that Pochin, after being informed by him of Theakston's illness, exclaimed "Good God! I hope the poor old gentleman will live till Tuesday, for I am then going over to Newmarket to settle his will for him, the instructions for which I have in this book"—a little pocket-book he had in his hand—"I took them last Friday. It will be an unlucky job for Charles Marson if the old gentleman should die before to-morrow, for he intended to leave him all his property." Pochin's impression then was, not that life was quite hopeless, for his words are, "I hope that the old gentleman will live till Tuesday." Here, again, his conduct is inconsistent with the instructions being final, and implies that he must have considered something further was to be settled; for otherwise he would instantly, upon hearing that Theakston was [313] so dangerously ill, have drawn up a short will—it would have been done in half an hour—and either have gone himself or sent Edwards back to Newmarket in order to have got it signed, taking the chance of Theakston being able to execute it. In accordance with his own wishes for a will, and in justice to Marson and his family, it was Pochin's duty to have made this attempt, and if he had thought that he had received final instructions, he must, I think, have taken this course. His conduct, then, in this respect, seems to negative final instructions.

On the part of the deceased himself there is a total silence as to the business; for it is not suggested that between Friday night and Monday, when he died of apoplexy, he ever alluded in the slightest degree to his having communicated with Pochin about his will. As before the evening of Friday, the 4th, so after that evening, in the intermediate space till his death, there is not the most trivial circumstance, from the deceased or any other person, to recognize a testamentary act of any sort.

If the case then rested here, supposing all the facts stated by Pochin to be credited, I am disposed to hold that those facts and circumstances would not be sufficient to establish a paper of this sort, and that the proof of final intention would be wanting.

IV. But, at all events, that proof appears to stand on the single testimony of Mr. Pochin; and the Court cannot wholly pass over without notice the point of law—whether the evidence of one witness, unsupported by any circumstances, makes legal proof of a testamentary act. The recognition of the sufficiency of such evidence seems to be big [314] with all the dangers against which the statute of frauds (29 Car. II. c. 3, s. 19) was intended to guard.

By the general law of these Courts one witness does not make full proof; (b) not that two witnesses are required to each particular fact, nor to every part of a transaction, for it often happens that to the contents of a will or to instructions there is only one witness—the confidential solicitor or other drawer—but there are and must be adminicular circumstances to the transaction—such as the expressed wishes of the testator to make his will, the sending for the drawer of it, his being left alone with the deceased for that known purpose, some previous declarations or subsequent recognitions, some extrinsic circumstances in short shewing that a testamentary act was in progress, and tending to corroborate the act itself: but in this case there is nothing except Pochin's own account of the occurrences of this quarter of an hour, not acknowledged by the deceased, nor even declared, while the deceased was yet alive, by Pochin himself, nor confirmed by his conduct. I am strongly inclined to think that these Courts have never held that such evidence of such an act, by a single witness, is alone sufficient to sustain it; and I should be unwilling to make such a precedent.

V. Supposing, however, that the evidence of a single individual, if fully credited, would be sufficient in law, still it must be beyond suspicion: and this consideration drives the Court very reluctantly to the unpleasant necessity of examining [315] the credit due to Mr. Pochin. Presenting himself with the title of "Reverend"—a beneficed clergyman with a living of considerable value, if I may judge from the number of his tithe tenants—Mr. Pochin comes, primâ facie, with a character above exception: but if his general conduct be inconsistent with his sacred profession and its duties, that very profession only serves to render his morality more questionable: a disregard for the decencies, and an indifference to the proprieties, of his station, as a beneficed clergyman, infer a general laxity of principle, and an absence of correct moral feeling. It appears that Mr. Pochin and Mr. Williamson were at the time of this transaction partners in several race horses, kept at the deceased's training stables—a fact which is carefully disguised in Mr. Pochin's deposition in chief, and which is only extracted by the interrogatories, and even then comes out reluctantly; for he first answers, "he (Theakston) had horses of mine to break and try, not always, but at times," which, looking to the real facts, is rather a prevaricating answer, for upon a further interrogatory he cannot escape from avowing that they were not horses "to break and try," but to train for the race-course: and it appears that these two gentlemen sometimes ran three or four horses in a day—not entered in the name of either party, but in that of "Henry." Mr. Pochin also lived in great intimacy with Theakston, his trainer, and with other persons—stable lads and jockeys—in that line.

(b) See Williams on Executors, vol. i. p. 195. Re Keeton, supra, 209. Kenrick v. Kenrick, supra, 130, 136. Also Crompton v. Butler, 1 Hagg. Con. 460.

Again, what occurred in the early part of the week preceding Theakston's death is not without importance. Pochin's history of that week is to this effect: On the Monday he went to Newmarket, taking with him a round of beef, a hare, [316] pheasants, and other provisions to entertain a party of friends at Theakston's on the following Saturday; he stayed till Wednesday, then returned to his living at Cornard; on Friday came back again in the evening, when it is alleged these memoranda in the pocket-book were written; on the Saturday was on the heath, having three or four horses to run; after the races he entertained at Theakston's eight of his tithe-payers at dinner, quitted the table between nine and ten, got into his carriage, and returned home to his living, a distance of twenty-five miles. This history does not excite in me the most favourable opinion of his regard to his moral duties, or to those sacred obligations he had undertaken at his ordination, and on receiving preferment. Again, on the Monday, Edwards, the jockey, who came over in great haste from Newmarket to Cornard, to solicit being Theakston's successor in the training of Pochin's horses, dined with Pochin in his own private room, and after remaining with him in conference five or six hours, departed about nine in the evening. The subjects of conference may be surmised, they could only have two subjects common to both, viz. horse-racing and Theakston's affairs.

To be in the secret and confidence of jockeys and trainers might not be inconvenient to this gentleman on the turf, if he ever made bets: whether, however, Mr. Pochin sometimes betted against his own horses, or whether he won money though his horse lost—a circumstance suggested by his own declaration, which is spoken to by Seaber—is a point to which it is not material now to advert. On the fifth article Seaber deposes to this effect: On Saturday, the 5th of November, I drove a friend of mine, Mr. Fitch, of [317] Great Cornard, upon the heath; while there he introduced me to the Reverend Mr. Pochin; and I recollect Mr. Fitch saying to him, "Why, Pochin, you got beat," to which Mr. Pochin replied, I did, but I don't mind it, for I gained seventy pounds by it. I remember this well, for I remarked to my friend "what a pretty sort of clergyman he was, for he must have betted against his own horse." Whether this was a fact or not, or mere rhodomontade, cannot be ascertained upon the evidence before me: Pochin certainly contradicts and positively denies both the fact and the declaration.

The circumstance, most favorable to shew the existence of some paper, is a declaration which Pochin says he made to Edwards on the Monday: this is stated in Pochin's answer to the twentieth interrogatory—an interrogatory calculated to bring out every thing in regard to this paper: "In talking with Edwards on Theakston's affairs I said he had left his wife 100l. a year, and Charles Marson all the rest, but that I was afraid that Charles would not get any thing, for that I was doubtful about a will, and I believe I said to him that the instructions were in my pocket-book, or that I had the will in my pocket-book, but was afraid it would not do." And upon Marson's second allegation Pochin deposes to the same declaration, and his statement is confirmed by Edwards.

A declaration coming out in this way, upon interrogatory, and afterwards confirmed, is, primâ facie, certainly strong, to shew, first, that such a declaration was made by Pochin, and next, that, if made, some writing was then in existence: still it is not conclusive even on the first point; and it is no more [318] than Pochin's own declaration, at the utmost, as to the existence of any memoranda. These two persons had a very long conference together on that Monday; Theakston's death and Marson's hoped for benefit was canvassed; it is possible that something might have been said on the Friday evening about making a will, for Pochin was anxious to obtain one, and often for falsehood there is some foundation of truth at the bottom. But here was, at least, an opportunity when Pochin and Edwards might have cooked up a story. At all events, Edwards, who comes forward to support it, does not prove the identity of the instrument in its present, or indeed in any, form: it was not seen by him; the pencil writing was not shewn, but only the outside of the pocket-book: there might be some other memoranda, for there is a leaf torn out; part of the present memoranda may have been written on this Monday, and other material parts, such as "read over and approved," may have been since added. The Court must look to Pochin's subsequent conduct and declarations, in order to consider the truth of this account.

On the evening of Theakston's death Pochin wrote a letter of condolence to Mrs. Leach, the mother of the widow, but in it there was no mention, not the slightest hint, of any instructions for a will, nor of any testamentary intentions. Pochin went to Newmarket on the Thursday morning, and had an interview with Mrs. Leach, but in that interview he gave no hint of any memorandum or instructions in writing: he said to Mrs. Leach, according to her evidence, that he (Pochin) was to have made Theakston's will, but he then gave a different account of the disposition, for on the seventh article she proceeds to depose in [319] this manner: "Mr. Pochin said the deceased's wishes were to give all his property to his wife for life, and at her death to the children of Charles Marson, the husband of my other daughter, and to whose family I always thought the deceased would leave some property. I then asked Mr. Pochin whether he had, according to Mr. Theakston's wish, written his will or any memorandum of his wishes, and he answered that he had not—that he had made none whatever."

On Friday, the 11th, Mr. Pochin met Marson on Newmarket heath, had a private conversation with him, and says he then told him "the whole particulars;" but he does not assert that he shewed him the pocket-book at that time. On the same day he visited the widow, he offered her his kind assistance, said he would be her friend, and looking over the deceased's papers, advised the widow to burn some, and he himself (as he admits) tore one of his own securities, given by him to Theakston, but any further destruction was prevented by the interposition of Mrs. Leach. In answer to the 18th interrogatory Pochin says, "I tore the cheque for 100l. in half, and left it in the drawer, telling Mrs. Leach that there was nothing in the deceased's possession that I was answerable for, save a promissory note for 350l., and a cheque for 17l. 10s., which I had given to cover a year's interest upon the note." I may here remark that this bill for 350l., which was to cover all other securities, was dated in June, 1831, and this torn draft in the October following. In this interview the widow declined any further assistance from Pochin, informing him that she had consulted Mr. Seaber, her professional adviser, and it was settled that Pochin's horses were not to be allowed to be [320] removed from the deceased's stables till the accounts should be settled. Here, again, upon this occasion there was no mention of any instructions or of memoranda.

On the next day, Saturday, the 12th, Marson had an interview with Mr. Seaber, and in his communication to that gentleman he expressly confirms Mrs. Leach and contradicts Pochin. "Marson informed me," says Mr. Seaber, on the 10th article, "on the evening of Saturday, the 12th of November, that Pochin told him he was with Theakston on the Friday night before he died, and told him that he meant his wife to have his property as long as she lived, and after that it was to come to my family,"—a much more probable disposition than what appears in the paper. "I asked him, Did Theakston give any memorandum, or did Pochin write any thing, or did Theakston sign any thing? Pochin replied 'No.' I said, Are you sure that no writing passed? He answered, So Pochin told me. I said, It is a very odd thing that Pochin should have made no memorandum of this; to which Marson replied, 'Oh! it was not necessary, as Pochin knew so well what Theakston meant, particularly as he was to be with him with a will the next Tuesday.'" And considering that the instructions were only to serve from Friday night till Tuesday, and were at the time merely intended for Pochin's own information, there seems to have been no occasion for the insertion at the close of them of "read and approved." Mr. Seaber then suggested whether any effect could be given to Theakston's intentions as a nuncupative will, but finding from Marson that Pochin was alone with the deceased, and that nothing was yet reduced into writing, the conversation closed by his remarking, "I don't [321] think you have any chance at all," to which Marson replied, "That is exactly what I thought, only to satisfy my friends I have come to you."

This conversation, agreeing with Mrs. Leach's testimony that no memorandum was made, passed upon the very day after that on which Pochin states he had communicated to Marson "the whole particulars," and it goes far to raise a doubt as to the truth of what is said to have taken place between Pochin and Edwards on the preceding Monday, and of the declaration that Pochin had the instructions in his pocket-book.

Mr. Pochin has been twice examined in chief, and also upon very long interrogatories; and it is extremely difficult to reconcile some parts of his evidence with others: it is more difficult to reconcile his conduct or his evidence to fairness and to truth. If he has conducted himself in a secret and suspicious manner, and suppressed certain clandestine behaviour till it is detected, his credit cannot go for much. I will proceed, however, to follow up the further account that Pochin gives of this testamentary instrument.

About the 14th of November Marson went over to Mr. Pochin at Cornard; Pochin says that he then shewed to him the pocket-book, but what was in it at that time is not proved; and here again was an opportunity of writing, or of adding to this memorandum. On that occasion they went together down to Sudbury to consult Mr. Ransom, Pochin's solicitor; but, strange to tell, they did not take the pocket-book: Mr. Ransom was not shewn it, Pochin had left it locked up at home; and, according to Pochin's account, Ransom must have supposed it was some inquiry about a nuncupative will, for Ransom said, "as [322] it was nuncupative, and not signed, it was not good;" to which Pochin replied, "he thought so too." This, however, is only Pochin's account, for Ransom has not been examined. It is possible that Ransom might have thought it a nuncupative will, because it was not signed, but it is more probable that he considered it nuncupative because nothing was written in Theakston's life-time; for that is the more correct and ordinary construction, agreeing, too, with Marson's account to Seaber, and with the opinion expressed by the latter, that the memorandum was not good as a nuncupative will, because only one person was present at the nuncupation.

Mr. Pochin's further account has strongly the appearance of fraudulent suppression: he mentions that Marson, after this conversation with Ransom, went to London —the necessary inference from which is, that he, Pochin, did not go to London; "that he gave himself no further trouble about the matter, never made any inquiries, nor again consulted as to the validity of this memorandum: he considered the business altogether in Marson's hands." Such is the result of his first examination; and yet it comes out upon the production of documents, and upon his subsequent examination, after seeing those documents, that he is bound to admit that he received letters—sent the pocket-book to London—came twice to London—made inquiries; and it appears that he has been throughout active in promoting Marson's interests, in endeavouring to establish the paper propounded. He says "he cannot remember dates, for he puts down nothing:" he ought then to have a better memory; for here are letters which have dates and contents, but which were not shewn [323] to the witness till a subsequent part of his cross-examination. One letter, which shews that he was going to London, and bears the post-mark of the 15th of November, is addressed to Theakston's widow, and is in these terms: "Dear Mrs. Theakston, I am sorry I cannot come over to Newmarket this week, as I am going to town. I have made enquiry as to the law respecting Mr. Theakston's affairs, and you must let them remain as much as possible as they are, till letters of administration are taken out."

There is, then, in this letter, nothing of any memorandum in writing, though in it Pochin speaks of an administration to be taken out. On the 22d he wrote to Seaber, and his letter begins thus: "I was in London last week, and have an appointment to be there again to-morrow, respecting some memoranda I took at Newmarket on the Friday night before Theakston died, for making a will." This letter then contains a reference to a second journey to London, and is the first suggestion appearing upon the evidence of any written testamentary memorandum having been taken down by Pochin in the deceased's life-time. On the 10th of November he had declared to Mrs. Leach that there was no memorandum in writing; again, on the 11th, he made the same declaration to Marson; on the 12th Marson repeated it to Seaber; and on the 14th Pochin held out to Ransom that the instructions were nuncupative: but now, having been in London, he for the first time suggested written instructions.

On Pochin's second examination, after he had seen, as I have observed, the letters annexed to the interrogatories, he could no longer deny that he had been in London, and made enquiries re-[324]-specting the memoranda; but still he will disclose as little as he can help, and persists in asserting that he took no interest in the matter. It is on the fourth interrogatory that he thus answers: "I have not, either prior to the commencement of this cause, or during its dependence, been actively or otherwise engaged in procuring evidence to sustain the validity of the will propounded. I never spoke to any body on the subject, not in the way of procuring evidence. I have very seldom seen the producent, and when I have done so, it has not been in respect to this cause, only on public occasions. I was in London, and asked privately the opinion of a friend in respect to such testamentary instruments as the one contained in the pocket-book; but I did not myself take or cause to be taken any counsel's opinion as to the will, or further, than as stated, interest myself on the subject. I considered the business in Marson's hands, and I did not go to London particularly, at any time, for the purpose of obtaining legal information as to the law of wills of personal estate, though I certainly did, when I was in London, shortly after deceased's death, write to Lord Exeter to interest himself on behalf of Marson. I only came to London once on the subject of Theakston's will: I cannot positively say the date of that journey; it was soon after Theakston's death; as I have heretofore deposed, I considered the business altogether in Marson's hands."

It was on the 28th of November that Pochin settled his account with the widow's solicitor, and gave her in his own and Williamson's name a joint note for 561l., in order to get their horses released. Upon that occasion he did not disclose [325] that there was any valid testamentary instrument of the deceased's in existence, nor did he make the least mention of the memorandum which he had obscurely referred to in his letter of the 22d to Mr. Seaber. Now in what way is that to be accounted for? The fact is, he had not then heard that the memorandum was in a shape to afford hopes of establishing its validity, notwithstanding he had been in London, and made inquiries of a friend (who was that friend does not appear), and notwithstanding he had been in communication with Mr. Walford, the solicitor who had been consulted in London upon it. Mr. Walford's letter, informing him of the possible validity of the memoranda, had not then arrived—it is not dated till the 29th of November. Its contents, however, again falsify that passage in Pochin's evidence in which he says, "As I have heretofore deposed, I considered the business altogether in Marson's hands:" for Mr. Walford writes direct to Pochin, informing him of the result of the opinion taken upon the instructions; states what course must be adopted to support them, and requests him to be at Newmarket in the following week, and arrange about the evidence. All this seems to me to prove that Pochin had been in close communication with Mr. Walford and with Marson in the whole preliminary consideration and arrangements of this business; and that his original suppression of his own going to London, and even his subsequent suggestion that he took no interest in the matter, but left it to Marson, is colourable prevarication.

It was asked, what inducement could Pochin have to commit fraud and falsehood in any part of this transaction? It was truly answered that [326] he was indebted to the deceased's estate. A letter of Pochin's to Seaber shews that he was embarrassed in his circumstances; his horses were detained till the accounts were settled, and he was indignant at their detention. Again, as trustee under this paper, he might acquire a great influence over the widow, a sickly woman, and over Marson, an ignorant training groom. And here is this fact, that he was extremely anxious to induce the deceased to make a will, and he is detected in taking an active part in endeavouring to establish the instructions; and if Pochin thought Marson illegitimate, he might have, in a case of intestacy, to contend with the Crown in a settlement of accounts, which he would probably be desirous of avoiding. The Court, however, is not to pronounce the parties guilty of forgery and perjury; that is not the issue to be tried; that is not the correct mode of viewing the question. It is incumbent upon Marson to prove these instructions by witnesses deserving of full credit. There has been in this case an abundant opportunity to fabricate them; and there is no evidence that they existed in their present form till after Pochin had been in London, and probably had learned what sort of instrument would be valid; and in his inquiries might even have been asked, Was the paper read over and approved? which words would be a very useful addition to the instrument in question.

That the paper propounded was written in the deceased's life-time, Pochin is the only witness; and he is wholly uncorroborated. His declaration on the Monday to Edwards is no corroboration of the fact; and it is only his assertion, not upon oath. Indeed, the date of the writing of any part [327] of the paper is not fixed by any confirmatory testimony; in its language it bears strong marks of having been written at a subsequent time. "Theakston's will, Nov. 4," is not the language of memoranda as instructions. So also, "Theakston wished me to make his will," as if recording a past transaction. "Read this to him when I took it down," again recording something past; for otherwise he would only have said "read:" and the word "approved" is written in an abbreviated form, and has much the appearance of being added. This language, coupled with the whole conduct of Pochin in not mentioning any instructions, and his declarations to Mrs. Leach and to Marson, as related to Seaber, create strong inferences that it was an ex post facto instrument, written after Theakston's death. But let it be distinctly understood that the Court does not decide that the instrument is fabricated; it only decides that the evidence of its authenticity is not omni exceptione major, and that to establish such an instrument the party setting it up must furnish unsuspected proof.

It is unnecessary for me to examine minutely other circumstances tending to discredit Pochin. The tearing of some securities, or at least, as he admits, of one draft for 100l., affects his general character. Again, he stands positively contradicted by Mrs. Leach and by Seaber; and, as to portions of his evidence, even by his own party, Marson. And yet it is upon Pochin's single testimony, in a case requiring the fullest and clearest proof, that the Court is asked to pronounce for this instrument.

It is not necessary for the Court to recapitulate the several points to which it has adverted: the [328] principles applicable to the instrument in question have been correctly pointed out in the authority already referred to. Looking then to the nature of the instrument, and to the evidence, even if true, adduced in support of it, the proof of fixed and final intention is by no means established. The disposition, as contained in this document, is, under all the circumstances, not probable; the act itself is in no degree led up to or confirmed: it rests mainly, if not solely, upon the testimony of Pochin, and upon his evidence I cannot venture to rely. The Court must, therefore, pronounce against the paper and for an intestacy: and considering the whole complexion of the case, the sort of links by which Pochin and Marson have connected themselves; the common object of both; and considering also that the widow, in case of an intestacy, will acquire only one-half of the property, and that she has been exposed to great expense and inconvenience, I think it will be short of justice not to decree her costs to be paid by Marson unless the Crown will allow them out of the moiety of the property to which it becomes entitled.

WICKWICK v. POWELL AND BRYANT. Prerogative Court, Mich. Term, By-Day, 1832.—Certain alterations and interlineations being pleaded in a will to be forgeries, the Court, on the evidence of one witness that she had seen the testator make such alterations, on probability arising from the state of his affections, and on a balance of evidence of handwriting, pronounced for probate of the will with such alterations, and condemned the opposing parties in costs.

Joseph Wickwick died on the 21st of July, 1831. His will, as propounded by the widow, claiming to be sole executrix, bore date the 25th of March, 1830, and was in substance as follows:—

The Winterbourne estate, given to his wife by Hester Evans, the testator devised upon trust, for [329] the sole use of his wife, her heirs and assigns. His Whiteshill estate he devised to his wife for life, then, together with all other his freehold estates, to his issue, and in default thereof, in such manner as he, by any codicil or writing in the nature of a codicil, might direct. To his two sisters, respectively, twenty-four shillings per month out of his personal estate, during their lives. Legacies to some of his relations and other persons, and, amongst others, 50l. to his relation John Powell, "as a gratuity to him for his active and friendly services in and about the execution of the trusts of this my will: and 25l. to my old and esteemed friend William Bryant, my other trustee." The will then declared, "I give, devise, and bequeath all the residue and remainder of my real and personal estate and effects to my said dear wife, and I hereby appoint the said John Powell and William Bryant trustees of this my will, and I appoint them, the said John Powell and William Bryant, and my said wife, sole executrix of this my will."

The words "devise," "real and personal" were interlined in the original will; and the word "sole" and letters "rix" were written on erasures, the former having been originally written "joint," and the latter "ors." These interlineations and erasures were the matters in dispute.

Lushington and Nicholl for the widow.

Addams contrà.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. This question arises on the will of Joseph Wickwick, which is duly executed and attested, and its validity is in no degree disputed. By the [330] will the wife is principally benefited; a small interest, about 800l., is given to the deceased's relations. His own freeholds, if there should be no issue of his marriage, are reserved to be disposed of by a codicil, or other writing purporting to be a codicil. Trustees are interposed, and a legacy of 50l. is given to Mr. Powell, one of the trustees, and of 25l. to Mr. Bryant, the other trustee. There is no reason, from the will itself, to suppose that the deceased intended to give his real estate to his heir at law, in case he had no children; he might propose to give it to his wife, or to his friend Powell, or to some other person. The external appearance of the will is not undeserving of notice: it has been, seemingly, folded up into different forms, and ultimately into the shape of a small square letter. The outsides are soiled and dirty; the paper has been sealed up, and it bears the following endorsement:—"The last will of Mr. Joseph Wickwick." This endorsement to me appears to be in the deceased's handwriting, but when it was written is not quite clear; it might possibly have been done before the will was folded and sealed; but it might have been, and it is rather more probable that it was, written after it was sealed: this point, however, is too uncertain to venture to deduce any inference from it. When the will was first produced and read after the funeral it is not in answers denied that there were some alterations in it, viz. from joint executors to sole executrix, and the question is whether these alterations were made by the deceased, or with his privity, or fraudulently, either in his life-time or since his death. That is the sole question. But that question, whichever way it is decided, will not affect the validity of the [331] will; and how some of the relations, who are legatees, and have been examined as witnesses, should have had it impressed upon their minds that the validity of the will, and their right to the legacies bequeathed to them, depended upon Powell and Bryant being held to be executors, and upon their success in this case, it may be difficult to account. The will is certainly entitled to probate; the bequests in it must all be valid; and the only question is whether probate should be granted to Powell, Bryant, and to the widow, Mrs. Wickwick, jointly, or to Mrs. Wickwick solely.

As originally executed, these three individuals were appointed executors jointly, but when the will was produced and read after the funeral, executors "jointly" had been altered to "sole" executrix; and the widow would have taken probate as sole executrix if Powell and Bryant, who had entered a caveat, had not opposed the grant. The widow has propounded the will as it now appears, and has alleged that it was altered by the deceased himself in May, 1830, in the presence of Ann Amos; that it was then sealed up by him, kept in his possession till his death, was produced after the funeral with the seal entire, and that then, for the first time, the seal was broken, and the will immediately read in the presence of Powell and Bryant and of other parties. Powell and Bryant, in their answers, deny most of this allegation; but they do not deny that the instrument was produced after the funeral with the seal entire; they do not deny that at that time the alteration to sole executrix was as it now appears; but they deny that the interlineations "devise" and "real and personal" were then in the will.

[332] I see no reason even to suspect that the interlineations were not also at that time in the will; for what passed at the reading over? Seventeen or eighteen persons were collected after the funeral to hear the will read. Washbourne, as the writer of the instrument, was employed to read it; he read it once or twice; Powell noticed and objected to some alterations, and made some remarks which gave offence to Washbourne—a talkative, self-important, irascible old man. He and Powell got into altercation. Powell asked for the will; Washbourne refused to give it to him; delivered it to the widow; and soon after, but separately, the widow and Washbourne left the room. Powell was very angry. Mrs. Wickwick's mother, Mrs. Amos, offered to fetch the will; it was fetched down, and Powell or Bryant read it. This is the general history of what occurred at the reading over after the funeral. The suggestion now is, that the interlineations were made between the first and second reading; and, as a proof of this suggestion, two or three of the relations—low, ignorant persons—depose that when the will was read by Washbourne, he neither read the names of Powell and Bryant nor the interlineations as to the real and personal estate. It is impossible to rely on such recollection; the omission imputed to Washbourne is highly improbable; even if it were made, it would be of no consequence; it might, indeed, shew absurdity in Washbourne, but it would not shew that the interlineations were not at that time there; moreover, it is proved to my satisfaction by two witnesses, Mrs. Rickards and Mrs. Marsh, that the alterations could not have been made between the first and second reading of the will; indeed, such [333] a suggestion is inconsistent with the case set up, viz. that the word "devise" was inserted by Washbourne, and the words "real and personal" by Charles Amos, the brother of Mrs. Wickwick, at the dictation of Washbourne. I am satisfied, then, that the whole alterations, by whomsoever made, were in the will when it was first opened and read after the funeral.

The question however is, by whom the alterations were made, whether by the deceased himself, as the widow has pleaded; or whether by the fraud and forgery of some other person—for that is the necessary alternative—and, further, that fraud and that forgery have been attempted to be supported by a mass of gross perjury.

The law does not presume fraud, and forgery, and perjury; they must be especially proved, or satisfactorily established by just and necessary inference arising from facts. The main alteration, at least as far as the present case is concerned, is the substitution of the words "sole executrix" instead of "joint executors," and the great inducement is, not a pecuniary benefit to any one, but only that the widow, as executrix, should not be disturbed by others, particularly by Mr. Powell, being joined with her in the executorship; for both he and Bryant still remain trustees.

What, then, is the account given by Ann Amos, the sister to Mrs. Wickwick? This witness is an unfortunate young woman, a cripple, living at home with her family, who are hat-makers, giving some little assistance to them in preparing the hats for sale, and receiving a small payment for such her work: this occupation was partly her amusement, and partly, as I have stated, a source of small profit. In looking to the account which [334] she gives, it will be the duty of the Court to consider how far it is supported by probability arising out of the other circumstances of the case, or how far it is so highly improbable as to become incredible, and to warrant the Court in concluding it to be a mass of gross perjury. She is a witness on whose testimony the case much depends, and I must therefore examine her evidence accurately. The account she gives is to this effect: "I am sister to Mrs. Wickwick. I knew deceased from the time I was a child; he was a collector of tithes and taxes, and used to be often in our house. He married my sister about two years ago. In May, 1830, they were about to go to Exeter to settle some accounts there, and they wished me to come and stay with them a few days before, and also to remain in the house, during their absence from home, with deceased's two sisters, who lived in the house, but took their meals in the kitchen. In the course of searching for some papers connected with the accounts—the object of his journey—on the afternoon of the 3d of May, the day before their journey, Mr. Wickwick and I were alone, and he took out of his pockets a number of papers, some in a pocket-book, and others loose, and among the latter was a paper folded up, on looking at which he exclaimed, 'Oh! this is my will; I want to make some alterations in it;' and added, 'some alterations respecting Mrs. W.' (so he called my sister); 'I wish to leave her sole executrix.' I recollect his words quite well. Just as he had spoken them my sister came into the room, when deceased said to her, 'I want to make you sole executrix, Mrs. W., if it won't be too much trouble for you.' I never wrote the words [335] down, but I recollect them as well as if he had said them only yesterday. My sister replied, 'As you like.' He then asked her for a candle, and while she was bringing it he began scratching something out with a penknife; it was at the back of the will, which was on a good sized sheet of paper, and written on the back and front too. When he had scratched out what he wanted, which was only in one place that I recollect, he wrote in the same place where he had scratched out; I did not notice what he wrote, but I did observe that when he had written there he wrote something more in another place of the will, but on the same side. Before he had done Mrs. Wickwick brought the candle and left it. He did not read the will when he had done, but I now recollect, and which makes me more sure that the alteration was on the back of the will, that the deceased on opening it, and looking over the first side, observed, 'No alteration there.' He folded the will up, and with a piece of red sealing-wax then on the table sealed it up, and put a plain seal which he carried to his watch-chain on the wax. When he had done this he took the will up and left the room: the other papers he had put into his pocket."

Now I see no improbability in any part of this account; the reason assigned for the presence of the witness at the particular time is probable; her sister and the deceased were about to take a journey; and though two of the deceased's sisters—persons of inferior station, who lived in the kitchen—were to remain, he might not choose to leave the house without the superintendence of some more confidential person under his roof. No attempt, indeed, has been made to [336] shew that the witness did not reside in the house during the absence of Mr. and Mrs. Wickwick. Again, the deceased was searching for some papers connected with the business which was the object of his journey—he carried a parcel of papers in his pocket, the instrument itself is dirty and bears traces of former foldings; the wife did not urge nor press the deceased, nor take much notice of his inquiry; her answer is, "As you like," and this upon her accidentally coming into the room. The witness, it is true, deposes that she recollects, a year and a half afterwards, the exact words and expressions; and this accuracy of memory is said to be quite incredible. But the strength of memory is very different in different persons; nothing varies more. This person is, on one account, very likely to be accurate: she mixed little in the world; her occupation was sedentary; few circumstances passed through her mind; she had no hurry of business, no moving about, to distract her; nothing, in fact, likely to divert her thoughts. I see, therefore, no incredibility, in this respect, in the narrative of the witness. That the deceased himself should have made and should have adopted this mode of making the alteration is not inconsistent with his character; Hooper describes him as an intelligent, busy, active man, a collector of rates and tithes, and clerk to magistrates; thus he might have become something of a lawyer himself. Washbourne, too, the drawer of the will—a talkative man, and who prided himself on his knowledge—is likely to have mentioned to the deceased the distinction between "devise" and "bequeath." It is not, therefore, in my opinion, improbable that the testator in altering his [337] will, when his object was to give away the undisposed part of his freehold property, should himself have inserted the word "devise," which had been used, as applied to realty, in the former parts of his will. Whether any or what effect is to be given to the words, forms no part of the present question: but the main circumstance, as far as regards my decision, is the exclusion of Powell and Bryant, who before were joint executors, from that office, and the substitution of the wife as sole executrix. Powell and Bryant were both the deceased's friends; they still remain trustees; Powell was the greatest friend, as appears from his having the largest legacy; he is described by his own witnesses as "the bosom friend," almost always at the deceased's house; and it is alleged that even after this date of May, 1830, and down to his death, the deceased's intimacy and friendship with Powell continued, and that he spoke of him as an executor as late as on a particular day in April, 1831. Such is the substance of the second and third articles of their plea.

But how is this part of the case supported, and what says their principal witness, Webley? Upon the second and third articles he thus deposes: "For the last fourteen or fifteen years of deceased's life I was on intimate terms with him; next to John Powell, I was deceased's most intimate friend. Powell was his bosom friend. Deceased often told me that Powell was the person he relied upon in all matters which required advice; more than twice or three times he told me that Powell was his executor and trustee. I frequently passed the evening with Powell at the deceased's, but not after deceased's marriage. To [338] the best of my recollection he did not mention Powell to me but once, and that was on the day of the horticultural meeting. The first show last year (1831) was on the 19th of April; the deceased was there, and spoke to me of Powell, and said how sorry he was he had not been able to find him, for certain things had been told him as having been said by Powell of him which he did not believe, and it was of importance that he should see him, as he (Powell) was his executor and trustee: this he said more than once. He did not say that he wanted to advise with Powell about his affairs, but that certain things had been told him as coming from Powell, and that he wanted to know whether all friendship was to be at an end between them, and he must see him, for he was his executor and trustee."

This conversation the witness states to have occurred in April, 1831. Now supposing that there is no error as to the date, and that it was after the horticultural meeting in April, 1831, that the deceased spoke in terms of friendship of Powell, and as his executor, the circumstance is of little weight, and no great reliance is to be placed on the mere recollection of expressions thus passing in conversation. Powell had been his intimate friend, his trustee, his executor; he might still retain a regard for him, and might still wish to see him, and to know "whether all friendship was at an end between them;" whether still he would act as his trustee, or whether it would be necessary to appoint a new trustee. Supposing all this to be so, it does not follow that the deceased had not made the alteration in his will and appointed his wife sole executrix. He might think that Powell would not act kindly and cor-[339]-dially with her; for what is the fact—not depending on loose expressions, nor upon the recollection of witnesses; and what are the dates?

The deceased had married a second wife; there was between them a considerable disparity of years, he being sixty-nine, she twenty-nine; she was a respectable person, and rather of a sedate character; she had lived as companion with a Mrs. Evans, who had left her some freehold property, now restored to her by this will. The marriage was in February, 1830, the will is dated in March following; the horticultural meeting took place in April; the alteration of the will in May, before going to Exeter. Here, then, comes the fact that nearly forms the basis of the whole business. Powell, formerly his "bosom friend," from the date of this second marriage never came near to the deceased: why this was does not exactly appear; he was, perhaps, dissatisfied with the marriage, and hence thought proper to resent it, because of the disparity in years. At first the deceased did not regard this absence as intentional, for in March he made Powell a trustee and executor; till then he may have supposed the absence accidental. But the horticultural meeting was in April; and up to May, above three months after the marriage, Powell had never called or seen the deceased. Here, at once, is a reason for the alteration in the will, it gives an appearance of truth to the transaction, and renders it and the account deposed to by Ann Amos perfectly probable. Nay, never from February, 1830, till the deceased's death did Powell call upon him, nor did the deceased and Powell—his best, his bosom, friend—ever meet. The allegation on this part of the case, [340] then, is not true. I do not rely on a slight variation, still less upon a mere difference of expression between the plea and the deposition which generally occurs, but on the substantial averment "that the deceased continued to be on terms of friendship and intimacy with John Powell and William Bryant to the time of his death; that he at all times entertained and expressed a great regard for them, and particularly for the said John Powell."

The alienation of Powell from the testator then renders the alteration itself, as well as the account given of it by the witness, perfectly natural and probable. Her evidence, therefore, thus far, is not in my mind in any degree shaken. But it is further confirmed by the similitude of the handwriting; for though there is conflicting evidence upon this part of the case, and the Court does not much rely on it, yet the weight of testimony appears in my judgment, without travelling through the observations made on each witness, to be in favour of the similitude. The deceased wrote differently, according to what he was writing: when in a hurry and bustle—in writing a receipt for rates and tithes—he wrote hastily and loosely; at other times he wrote more formally. Some of the witnesses differ as to which words are most like; some think the interlineation, others the alteration. But though the interlineation and the alteration were written at the same time, the substratum is different; the one is on a fresh part of the paper, the other on an erasure; and every person writing on an erasure does it more carefully and formally. There is something, though it is slight, in the alteration itself not entirely unworthy of notice. The whole of the word "joint" is not erased: the j, and it seems the o, are not [341] erased; the j serves for an s by adding a top or loop to it, the o serves as the second letter in sole, and the other letters are not erased, but are written over "rix." Now this is more likely to have been the course taken by the deceased himself to save time and trouble, than by persons who were fraudulently altering the will for the purpose of deception.

The same observation and reasons apply to not striking out the names of Powell and Bryant. The fraudulent persons would have proceeded with more correctness and deliberation; but the deceased, according to Ann Amos's account, made the alterations in a hurry, sealed up the will, and put it away; and so it remained till the funeral. I have made these observations certainly without attributing much importance to them, yet they tend to support the testimony of Ann Amos.

Another ground of falsification is set up. It is said the question about the handwriting and the alteration was immediately raised—how happened it that it was not immediately declared that Ann Amos was present? and, further, how did it happen that Ann Amos did not immediately disclose all she knew about the transaction? Interrogatories, calling for explanation on these points, have been put; if the explanations are satisfactory, they have the greater force thus elicited by interrogatory, and will confirm, not destroy, Ann Amos's credit. She is examined in chief and on interrogatories on the same day. To the second interrogatory she answers, "I did not tell the producent (Mrs. Wickwick) of the alterations in the will, because she knew of them as well as myself; and I did not tell any body else about it till after Mr. Wickwick's death. I did not think any [342] thing more about the matter till the dispute arose about it; that was after the funeral. I was not present on that occasion, but when the friends came home I understood there was a dispute about the will. I did not say any thing about it then, because I did not understand the rights of the dispute; and it was late. The first time I spoke of it to any body was after my sister put the business into the hands of Mr. Tanner; I think it was about a fortnight after the funeral. My brother Charles came home and said he had been to see the alterations in the will, and really believed them to be in Mr. Wickwick's handwriting; and I then said, 'You believe it to be in his handwriting—I know it is, for I saw him do it.' I did not till that moment know what was the particular cause of dispute in the will; and therefore I had not spoken to any body of it. My brother spoke sharp to me about it, and asked 'why I had not mentioned it before?' and I said, 'I never gave it a thought.'"

This seems a very natural and probable account. The witness was a mere by-stander when the alteration was made: at the reading of the will after the funeral she was not present, she was confined by her infirmity, and by an attendance upon her business. She would hear little about the handwriting of the interlineations; she could not mix much, if at all, in what was going forward at the widow's house; and it seems fairly accounted for that she should not know any thing of the dispute in respect of the will till the matter of it was brought to her knowledge in the way in which she has described, a fortnight after the dispute had occurred. In this explanation she is confirmed by her brother, who was examined before [343] her; by her mother, who was examined after her; and by the widow's answers; and the witnesses state that they have not disclosed their depositions nor their answers to the interrogatories. The widow's answers were not given in till after these witnesses were examined. Their evidence, therefore, could not assume a colour from them; and unless the three witnesses are perjured, the account given by Ann Amos must be true.

There is, however, it is said, this further difficulty, that the widow should not have recollected that her sister Ann was present when the deceased altered his will: but the explanation of that also is by no means improbable or unnatural; it comes out quite accidentally in answer to an interrogatory. The twenty-fifth interrogatory put to the sister is in these words: "By whom, and when, and where were you applied to, to become a witness in this cause? What passed at the time you were applied to, and who was or were present? State the same fully and at large." To this interrogatory she answers, "It was my sister who asked me to be a witness; she came to me a few days after I had told my brother that I was present when the deceased altered his will, and asked, 'Could I recollect the circumstance of Mr. Wickwick's altering his will?' I said I could, and I told her all I have now deposed. My sister remarked she had quite forgotten that I was present, but when I called to her mind that she came in, and about the candle, she recollected that I was, and said she was glad I remembered it, and that I must give evidence of it."

There is no improbability I think in this account. How often does it happen that people [344] forget a transaction until some particular circumstance is brought back to their remembrance, and then the whole facts in connexion with it revive in their recollection, and rush back into their memory. Here was nothing particular to make Mrs. Wickwick recollect that her sister was with the deceased at the time of the alterations in the will; she herself was in the room scarcely more than a minute; the deceased merely asked her whether she had any objection to be sole executrix; she answered only "As you like;" and when she brought in the candle she put it down and went out again directly—probably busy in making her arrangements for her journey on the next morning; taking, therefore, no part in the transaction, nor, as far as appears, exchanging a word with her sister at the time, who was a mere looker-on, and would probably be silent, seeing that the deceased was busily engaged.

I see, then, not the least improbability that the widow should have forgotten that her sister was in the room at the time of the alterations in question, and that her presence should have been only recalled to her recollection in the manner explained upon the interrogatory.

Many minute and ingenious observations have been made on other points, which seem unnecessary to be further examined and discussed by the Court; for being of opinion that the positive evidence given by Ann Amos, of her seeing the alterations made, in the natural manner in which she has stated it, and those alterations being supported, in point of probability, by the fact that Powell, from the time of the deceased's marriage, wholly withdrew himself from his society—the [345] deceased being strongly attached to his wife, and wishing to relieve her in some degree from the adverse feelings of Powell, who had not paid her even common attention—and being also of opinion that the genuineness of the handwriting is confirmed by the weight of evidence, I pronounce that in my judgment the widow is entitled to probate, as sole executrix of this will.

In respect to costs, it has always seemed to me, and the Court, I believe, before intimated as much, that this must be a case for costs, on one side or on the other. Probate to the wife has been resisted on the ground of forgery and perjury; and the case has been characterized as of that description, to the very last stage of the argument. If the case were so proved, the words introduced and interlined must be expunged, the will restored to its original form, and the widow be condemned in the payment of the costs. If, however, the alterations are proved to be the deceased's own act, then the widow has been unjustly charged with very gross fraud, crime, and perjury, and with offering a mass of perjured evidence in support of her case: these are no light imputations. But, besides this, the Court must remember that, though the deceased intended that the widow should have the immediate enjoyment of the bulk of the property, and the poor relations of their legacies, yet that the whole property has been tied up for a year and a half by this unfounded resistance to the probate. Thinking, therefore, that the parties set up these charges at the peril of costs, I am bound to condemn Powell and Bryant in those costs; though even such a decree will be but poor amends to [346] the widow for the anxiety and inconvenience to which she has been put by these proceedings.

The Court directed probate to pass to the widow as sole executrix, and condemned the other parties in costs.

MOORE v. DARELL AND BUDD. Prerogative Court, Mich. Term, By-Day, 1832.—The deceased (the son of a British subject who resided for several years up to his death in Ireland, and had purchased property there), though occasionally claiming the privileges of a British subject and visiting England, but who was born, educated, established as a merchant, and who died in Spain, held to be clearly domiciled in Spain, and consequently that the law of Spain was to govern the disposition of his property.

[Explained, Maltass v. Maltass, 1844, 1 Rob. Ecc. 79.]

Thomas Moore, a widower, died at Alicant on the 18th of February, 1830. He left, in his own hand-writing, a testamentary paper, a copy of which (the original being deposited in one of the Spanish legal tribunals) was propounded, as entitled to probate, on behalf of Mr. Budd, an executor.(a) The will commenced thus: "In the name of God. Amen. I, Thomas Moore, born at Alicant, in the kingdom of Spain, but a subject of his Britannic Majesty, make this my last will and testament:" and in the concluding clause was this sentence—"This is my last will and testament, written with my own hand this 27th of September, 1828." The will directed his executors to convert all his property (save his house and premises at Alicant) into ready money, invest it, and pay to W. H. Budd, eldest son of his late beloved wife, an annuity of 73l. sterling, or 365 hard dollars. It left also six separate annuities of 18l. 5s. (with a provision for doubling [347] them) to the Budds, descendants of his late wife, with an additional sum of 500l. sterling to a grand-child; and directed that, to entitle W. H. Budd to his annuity of 73l., he should reside at Alicant, in the house in which his mother died, and preserve the same and the garden in their present state, and that his brothers and sisters should have a room in the house, and board therein, in the manner expressed in a separate paper.(a)[1] It further directed that, after the death of the testator's late wife's children, grand-children, &c., the house and premises at Alicant should go to the younger brother of the then possessor of Moore Hall, Mayo, Ireland; or in default of such brother, to his younger son or daughter, preferring the one who will reside therein. The residue was placed at the disposal of Mrs. Taylor, who, with W. H. Budd, Mr. Darell, and Mr. Evans, were appointed executors. There was an attestation clause in these words: "Signed, sealed, and declared by the testator as his last will and testament, in presence of us." But there was no signature nor attestation. The will was enclosed in a separate half-sheet of paper, sealed up and endorsed: "This is my last will and testament. Thomas Moore." There was also a copy of this will, signed by the deceased, and verified by him as an exact copy, which was found among his papers, and annexed to Mr. Budd's allegation. The deceased left two brothers—his only next of kin—the persons entitled in distribution under an intestacy. It appeared from the allegation, setting up the copy of [348] this will, that the deceased's property in England consisted of his distributive share of the proceeds of the estate and effects of his late mother,(a)[2] and was valued at 7000l.; that he was also possessed of property to a considerable amount in Spain: that in 1813 he married Mrs. Budd (who died in September, 1827), the mother of one of the parties in the cause: in 1821 made a will (a copy of which was annexed), bequeathing her the whole of his property; that his affection and regard for her, her children by a former husband, and her grand-children, were unabated.

(a) Mr. Darell, another executor, had originally appeared, but he declined propounding the paper offered for probate: he, however, was not dismissed from the suit.

On behalf of George Moore, one of the brothers, it was pleaded that the deceased was son of George Moore, the principal in an eminent mercantile house at Alicant, was there born in 1775, and after passing his childhood in Spain was educated at Thoulouse and Liege, ultimately became the head of the house at Alicant, and continued, to his death, to be there domiciled: that in 1817 he ceased to have any connexion with mercantile or other business; that he never visited the British dominions, save in 1797, 1800, 1803, 1807, 1815, 1821, to see his relations and connexions, and that in 1821 he was in England for about six weeks only: that by the law of Spain a will or testamentary paper of a person dying there domiciled, not executed in the presence of a notary public, and two, three, or more competent witnesses, or the execution whereof should not be attested by the subscription of a notary public, and such number of competent witnesses, was null and void; and that accordingly it had been pronounced, by the proper tribunal at Ali-[349]-cant, that the brothers of the deceased were his heirs, as dying intestate.

Five witnesses were examined in support of this allegation; three were Spanish lawyers, who deposed to the law of Spain; the other two were merchants, who knew the deceased in Spain. Mr. Wallace, in his evidence, deposed: "I considered the deceased to be what I was myself, a British subject, resident for mercantile purposes in Alicant; but I was not born in Spain. As far as I know, he was always treated by the Spanish authorities as a British subject." Mr. Saumarez Carey, of Alicant, deposed: "The deceased never claimed, and would not take, the character of a Spanish subject; on the contrary, he claimed British protection as a British subject, and his name was always included in the list of British residents in Alicant kept by the consul there."

It was pleaded in a responsive allegation that the deceased's father was a natural-born British subject; that he died in Ireland in 1797, where he had resided for several years on an estate he had purchased, and which had descended to his son, the party in the cause: that the deceased's mother, though born in Spain, was the daughter of a British subject, and died, in 1813, in a house in Montagu Square, London, which she had purchased: and that the deceased was, in right of his father, a natural-born subject of this kingdom, and entitled, by the law of this kingdom, to all the rights and privileges to which he would be entitled had he been born within the British

---

(a)[1] The will referred to separate papers, written and to be written, relating as above, and to his funeral, &c.; but there were none produced, or stated to have been written.

(a)[2] See Moore v. Moore, 1 Phill. 375.

dominions.(a)[1] That, in 1797, he, the deceased, [350] returned to Alicant, and continued to reside in Spain on account of trade, and divers law-suits in prosecution at his death: and that as a British subject he was entitled, under the existing treaties of amity and commerce between this country and Spain, to all the rights, privileges, and advantages granted by them to British subjects.(a)[2] That the [351] deceased was in this country from 1807 to the middle of 1812; from the beginning of 1813 to the latter end of 1818; and that when he quitted this country in 1821 he intended to return; and that he frequently so declared to his death. That the British consul locked up and sealed the doors of the rooms in which were the deceased's papers, invited the British subjects to his funeral, and afterwards inspected his papers, testamentary and others, in the presence of certain British and Spanish merchants, and of the agent of George Moore, the party in this cause; and subsequently again sealed up the rooms officially, in conformity with the provisions of the treaties between this kingdom and Spain. It further pleaded that in the proceedings before the tribunal at Alicant, the domicil of the deceased, or the question as to whether he was a British or a Spanish subject, was not put in issue, and that the sentence given therein declared only that, according to the laws of Spain, the deceased had died intestate, and that G. and P. Moore, being his next of kin, were his heirs; that an appeal from this sentence was still pending, in which it was pleaded that the deceased had died a British subject, and not domiciled in Spain; and that [352] the executors were not parties to the suit at Alicant.

This allegation was supported by extracts from the treaties, by official documents,

---

(a)[1] 25 Edw. III. st. 2. 7 Ann. c. 5. 4 Geo. II. c. 21. 13 Geo. III. c. 21.

(a)[2] Extracts from treaties between Great Britain and Spain.

By the 9th article of a treaty, signed at Madrid 13 May, O. S. 1667, it is provided that the subjects of the King of Great Britain trading, buying, and selling in any of the kingdoms, governments, islands, ports, or territories of the King of Spain shall have, use, and enjoy all the privileges and immunities which the said King hath granted and confirmed to the English merchants that reside in Andalusia, by his royal orders dated the 19th of March, 26th of June, and 9th of November, 1645. His Catholic Majesty, by these presents, re-confirming the same as a part of this treaty between the two Crowns.

33d article. That the goods and estates of the people and subjects of the one King that shall die in the countries, lands, and dominions of the other, shall be preserved for the lawful heirs and successors of the deceased, the right of any third person always reserved.

34th. That the goods and estates of the subjects of the King of Great Britain that shall die without making a will, in the dominions of the King of Spain, shall be put into inventory with their papers, writings, and books of account, by the consul, or other public minister of the King of Great Britain, and deposited in the hands of two or three merchants, that shall be named by the consul or public minister, to be kept for the proprietors and creditors; and no judicatory whatsoever shall intermeddle therein, which also in the like case shall be observed in England towards the subjects of the King of Spain.

35th. That decent and convenient burial-place be granted and appointed to bury the bodies of British subjects dying in Spain.

38th. That British and Spanish subjects shall have and enjoy, in the respective territories of Great Britain and Spain, the same privileges and immunities which have been, or shall hereafter be, granted by either King to the states general of the United Provinces, the Hans Towns, or any other kingdom or state whatsoever, in as full, ample, and beneficial manner as if the same were particularly mentioned and inserted in this treaty.

Extract from the treaty (referred to in the preceding article) between Spain and the United Provinces of the Low Countries, made at Munster, 30th January, 1648.

By the 62d article it is provided that the subjects and inhabitants of the countries of the said lords, the King, and the states, of whatever quality or condition they be, are declared capable of succeeding to one another as well without as with a will, according to the customs of the places; and if any successions of legacies have formerly fallen to any of them, they shall be maintained and preserved in their right thereto.

and letters from the deceased, some to the British minister at Madrid, shewing that he considered himself, and claimed to be considered, as a British subject. It was opposed, on the ground that the facts, if all proved, would be inadequate, after the case of Stanley v. Bernes (3 Hagg. Ecc. 373), to establish that the deceased was not domiciled in Spain.

The King's advocate and Curteis for Mr. Budd.

Lushington and Addams for Mr. Moore.

Per Curiam. In Stanley v. Bernes Mr. Stanley was naturalized in Portugal; here, though the deceased made a long residence in Spain, yet it is alleged that he always lived there, and was recognized there, as a British subject. Mr. Stanley took all the advantages of a Portuguese subject. Here it is said that the deceased resided abroad under the faith of special treaties. Cases of domicil do not depend on residence alone, but on a consideration of all the circumstances of each particular case. Reserving all questions, I admit the allegation.

The allegation being admitted, Mr. Moore's answers were taken, but no witnesses examined: and when the cause was opened, at the final hearing, upon an inquiry by the Court whether, according to the principles recognized by the Courts of this country, there could be a doubt that the deceased was domiciled in Spain, the King's advocate declined further arguing the case.

[353] Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. Thomas Moore died at Alicant, in Spain, in Feb., 1830; he left two brothers, one of whom is a lunatic. In 1813 the deceased married a widow, Mrs. Catherine Budd, the mother of one of the parties in this cause; she died in September, 1827, leaving several children by her first husband, and also grand-children. It is alleged that, after his wife's death, the deceased made a will in his own hand-writing, dated the 27th of September, 1828; this will is set up by Mr. Budd, one of the executors; it is not signed, but it is pleaded to have been sealed up in an envelope endorsed in the deceased's handwriting—"This is my last will and testament, Thomas Moore." Upon the death of Mr. Moore, this will being found among his papers by Mr. Waring, the British vice consul, was officially deposited by him in Spain. In order to try its validity, proceedings were instituted in the Spanish tribunals at Alicant; they decided that the deceased was intestate: however, it is alleged that an appeal from this decision is now depending before the Superior Court at Madrid.

It is admitted that the deceased's father was, by birth, a British subject; that he went to Spain, there married a Spanish lady, and engaged in business; that he afterwards retired from business, returned to the United Kingdom with his wife, purchased property in Ireland, and finally died in that country. His son, the party in the cause deceased, was born in Spain, was at his father's expense educated abroad, became, first, a partner with him in trade in Spain, and afterwards the principal of the same mercantile esta-[354]-blishment; married, and took his wife to Spain, and there he and his wife died. The deceased may have been a subject of both Great Britain and Spain; but the question is, where was he domiciled at his death? For though he might occasionally visit England, and make a considerable stay here; though, under a special act of parliament,(a) his father being a British subject, he was entitled to certain privileges, and to be considered for certain purposes, as a British subject (and when it was convenient to him he certainly appears to have claimed that character); yet by birth he was a Spaniard, and by education, by trade and commerce, by residence at his death, he was domiciled in Spain. Is, then, the law of England or the law of Spain to govern, after his death, the disposition of his property, and in what forum is that question to be decided? If the law of Spain, there seems little doubt—indeed it is not attempted to be argued to the contrary—that by the law of that country he is dead intestate. If the law of England, what proof is there of the instrument propounded, either as the act of the deceased, or that, being unexecuted, it is valid. I entertain considerable doubt whether the mere inscription on the envelope and the finding would be sufficient to give the paper effect. But it is not necessary for me to entertain that question. The lex domicilii must govern this case; and I accordingly pronounce that the deceased is intestate, and decree administration to the brother.

(a) 7 Ann. c. 5, explained by 4 Geo. II. c. 21.

[355] IN THE GOODS OF LORD RIVERS. Prerogative Court, Mich. Term, Caveat Day, 1832.—Administration (to the nominee of the remitter of a bill of exchange payable to the order of the deceased, but not endorsed) limited to receive, and to give a discharge to a third party for, the said bill, and to apply the same to the use of the remitter, refused.

On motion.

In January, 1831, William Lord Rivers died intestate: his widow and children having renounced the administration, a limited grant was made to Mr. Young, as Sir William Rumbold's nominee, to attend some proceedings in Chancery. No further administration had been granted. In September, 1830, Sir W. Rumbold remitted from Calcutta, to the deceased, under cover to Ransom and Co., his bankers, a bill of exchange for 500l., drawn by Mackintosh and Co., of Calcutta, on Messrs. Rickards, of London, and payable six months after date to Lord Rivers or his order. This bill was accepted by Messrs. Rickards; but previous to its arrival Lord Rivers had died. In November, 1830, Sir William Rumbold wrote from Calcutta to Ransom and Co. "that he wished the whole 500l. to be placed to his account (unless Lord Rivers should find it necessary to deduct from it 270l.) to pay to Mrs. Rigby, to whom he was indebted much beyond 500l., on account of his children, who were under her care, all such sums on his account as she might require, and that he should consider himself bound by any arrangements she might make in his name." As the bill had not been endorsed by Lord Rivers, Messrs. Rickards refused to pay the same save to his legal representative, or to the order of such representative.

[356] Lushington, upon affidavits of the above facts, and stating that if any consent were required from Lady Rivers, notwithstanding her renunciation, she was ready to give it, moved for an administration to be granted to Mrs. Rigby, on behalf of Sir William Rumbold, and limited to receive and give a discharge to Messrs. Rickards for the 500l., and to apply the same to the use of Sir W. Rumbold.

Per Curiam. As this bill of exchange was not paid to the order of Lord Rivers, Sir William Rumbold, who remitted it, was a debtor to, not a creditor of, Lord Rivers's estate; and as application for a limited administration to be granted to the nominee of a debtor is quite novel, I must reject it.

Motion rejected.

SHINGLER v. PEMBERTON AND OTHERS. Mich. Term, 1st Session, 1832.—Administration, with a deed of assignment (to take effect on the death) annexed, granted to the assignee as universal legatee in trust, on consent of all parties entitled under an intestacy.

Timothy Pemberton died in August, 1829, leaving a widow and two sisters, viz. Susannah Burroughs (formerly Joy), wife of William Burroughs, and Martha Lloyd, widow, his only next of kin; and John and Thomas Meares (children of Ann Meares, a sister of the deceased, who died in 1826) the only persons entitled in distribution to his personal estate and effects undisposed of by deed or will.

By indenture, dated the 24th of February, 1821, made between Timothy Pemberton (the deceased); his said two sisters; Thomas Meares; [357] Susan Joy, widow; and Peter Shingler; it is recited "that Martha Lloyd and Ann Meares were entitled to a leasehold farm for the life of the said Pemberton; that Pemberton, in pursuance of such agreement between the said parties, and in consideration of natural love and affection for his said three sisters, and of ten shillings paid to him by Shingler, assigned to Shingler, his executors, &c. &c. the household goods, farming-stock, and all other the personal estate and effects whatsoever which he (Pemberton) then had, or should be entitled to, or possessed of, at his decease, upon trust, to permit him (Pemberton), during his life, to enjoy the same, and after his decease to convert all into money; to pay £100 to Mrs. Joy, and pay the interest of one-third of the residue to Mrs. Lloyd for life, and after her death to divide the said third part equally between her children; and to pay the interest of one other third part to Mrs. Meares for life, and after her death to divide that third part equally between her children, John, Thomas, and Ann, wife of Henry Whitford; and to pay the interest of the remaining third to Mrs. Joy for life, and at her death to divide that third equally between the children of Mrs. Lloyd and Mrs. Meares; that Mrs. Lloyd and Thomas Meares, in consideration of the said assignment, covenanted that they would permit Pemberton, during his life, to occupy the farm, subject to the lease; and Pemberton covenanted that Mrs. Lloyd should reside with him during his life without paying for her board and maintenance."

This deed was signed, sealed, and delivered by Timothy Pemberton, Thomas Meares, Martha Lloyd, and Susan Joy, in the presence of John Walford.

Mr. Shingler, the trustee, acted in the execu-[358]-tion of the trusts of this deed; paid, both in Pemberton's life-time and since, some of his debts, others being unpaid; and also paid the expenses of Pemberton's funeral.

Henry Whitford, the husband of one of the deceased's nieces (who died in his life), filed a bill in Chancery against Shingler, as trustee for the execution of the deed; and in June, 1831, it was referred to a master to take an account of the monies received by Shingler under the deed; when the plaintiff's solicitor objected to allow Shingler any sums (whether debts of the deceased or otherwise) paid since Pemberton's death; but did not object to payments made by him in the deceased's life; the master, however, objected to allow any of these payments, whether made before or after the death.

Shingler was not a creditor of Pemberton at his death. No question as to the validity of the deed was raised in the Court of Chancery.

Lushington, after stating that he should not press a decision in the Court of Exchequer,(a)[1] because the soundness of it was doubted, holding that property passing under a deed was liable to legacy duty, moved, upon a proxy of consent from the parties entitled in distribution under an intestacy, for administration, with the deed annexed, to be granted to Shingler, as universal legatee in trust, on the ground that the deed was not effectual at its execution, and that the case came within the principles upon which instruments, having the form of deeds, but being wills in substance and [359] effect, had been admitted as testamentary in a Court of Probate.

Per Curiam. The present application is that a deed of assignment, the validity of which deed is said to be questionable, may be proved as testamentary. It is well known that there are many instances in which instruments executed as deeds have been allowed to be proved as wills.(a)[2] The primary consideration, in all such cases, has always been whether the instrument was intended to operate in the life-time of the party deceased, or be consummated only on death.(b) Here the deed reserved to Pemberton all the beneficial interest in the property till his death; that event on which the whole was to be consummated has now happened. The parties entitled under an intestacy consent to this application; and, under all the circumstances, I am of opinion that the administration, with this instrument annexed, may be granted to Mr. Shingler, as the universal legatee in trust.

Motion granted.

[360] IN THE GOODS OF JAMES CASSIDY. Prerogative Court, Mich. Term, 4th Session, 1832.—Administration, with a will annexed, granted to an attorney of the executor who was abroad, not revoked, but pronounced to have ceased and expired on application of the executor for probate, and on affidavit that no suits were pending. Future grants, durante absentiâ, to be further limited, until the executor, or party entitled to administration, duly apply for and obtain a grant.

[Referred to, Webb v. Kirby, 1856, 7 De G. M. & G. 381; Rainbow v. Kittoe, [1916] 1 Ch. 316.]

On motion.

In 1825 administration, with the late Mr. Cassidy's will, was granted "for the use and benefit of J. Cassidy, the son, and one of the surviving executors (the other having renounced), then at sea," to Mr. Ashley, his attorney.

The son—being now in England, and desirous of probate, and the administration with the will annexed having been brought in by the attorney, with the usual affidavit "that no action at law or suit in equity has been brought by or against him as administrator"—had been sworn as executor; and now prayed that the administration should be declared to have ceased and expired, and that probate be granted to

---

(a)[1] Attorney-General v. Jones and Bartlett, 3 Price, 368. See this case commented upon in Sugden on Powers, 5th ed. p. 225, in notis.

(a)[2] See Masterman v. Maberly, 2 Hagg. Ecc. 235. The King's Proctor v. Daines 3 ib. 218.

(b) See Glynn v. Oglander, 2 Hagg. Ecc. 428.

him. The application, in respect of the letters of administration, was objected to in the registry, on the ground than in some similar cases the administration had been expressly revoked.

The King's advocate in support of the motion. The administration, having been rightly granted, ought not to be revoked. A revocation which is unnecessary may possibly be injurious; for it may render some of the administrator's acts void: and would certainly be inconvenient; for the probate would be considered at the stamp office as an original, and consequently probate duty required to [361] be paid as for an original grant, and the duty, already paid on the administration, could only be recovered upon a special application to the commissioners, supported by affidavit: whereas if the administration be declared to have ceased and expired, the probate will pass at the stamp office upon a free stamp.

Per Curiam. The Court declared the administration cum testamento annexo to have ceased and expired; and directed that, in future, grants, durante absentiâ, to attorneys, should be limited "for the use and benefit of resident at ," and until the executor (or the party entitled to the administration) should duly apply for and obtain probate or administration.

Motion granted.

COPPIN v. DILLON. Prerogative Court, Hil. Term, 1st Session, 1833.—Deceased died on the 19th of October, 1831, having made a will in 1820, and three codicils, all formally executed and attested to carry realty; he destroyed the will, but on each of the codicils was written, "June 18, 1830, my will, John Plura," and other endorsements at a subsequent date, inferring that he considered that at such time he had no will. In 1830 he executed a new will and a codicil, the latter subsequent to June, 1830, which will and codicil were not forthcoming, and in 1831 he executed a settlement. Three codicils, the settlement, and its envelope were propounded as together containing the will, the Court holding, first, that the destruction of the will of 1820, primâ facie, revoked the codicils, that the words written on the codicils were not conclusive of an intention that they should operate as substantive papers, that evidence dehors the papers was therefore admissible, and on such evidence that the will and codicil of 1830 must be presumed to have been destroyed by the deceased, but though destroyed, would, primâ facie, have been revocatory of the former will and codicils, and that the settlement was intended as a substitution for the codicils, pronounced for an intestacy, and refused costs out of the estate.—The Court granted administration to the unsuccessful party (though the younger daughter), the minors, grand-children, joining in the prayer for such grant, and, on the application of the other daughter, directed the securities to justify in respect of her interest.

John Plura, a widower, died on the 19th of October, 1831; he left two daughters, Mrs. Coppin and Mrs. Dillon, and two grand-children (minors), the issue of Mrs. Gray, a deceased daughter. His property, freehold, copyhold, and personal, was, at the very lowest, estimated at 45,000l.

Five papers, viz., three codicils to a will destroyed by the deceased, a deed of settlement, and the envelope to it were propounded as together containing the deceased's will, on behalf of the husband of Mrs. Coppin, as the executor [362] thereof. They were opposed by Mrs. Dillon, who insisted that the deceased had died intestate. Mr. Gray, the father of the minors, intervened and opposed the deed of settlement and envelope. The instruments themselves, the material parts of the history of the deceased, and the particulars of his property, with the facts of the case, are set forth in the judgment.

The King's advocate and Addams for Mrs. Coppin.

Phillimore for the children of Mrs. Gray.

Lushington and Dodson for Mrs. Dillon.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. John Plura died on the 19th of October, 1831, a widower, at the age of seventy-eight years, leaving two daughters, Mrs. Coppin and Mrs. Dillon; and two grand-children, the issue of a deceased daughter, Mrs. Gray. His property amounted to 45,000l. or 50,000l., of which about 10,000l. was freehold and copyhold; the rest was personalty.

The deceased acquired this property as an auctioneer, a calling which probably afforded opportunities of advantageous purchases; and possibly may account for the varied nature of his property. He had retired some years from business, and his fortune seems to have suffered some diminution. On two of his daughters he had made considerable settlements at the periods of their respective marriages. 5000l. 5 per cents. on Mrs. Gray in 1816; and 10,000l. 3 per cents. on Mrs. Dillon in 1820; but he made no settlement on Mrs. Coppin's marriage. He had sustained losses by Mr. Gray, and had also made an unsuccessful speculation in a vessel in conjunction with Mr. Coppin. Hence it is probable that at [363] one period he was a richer man than at the time of his death.

Towards his family he was an affectionate father, for though he might have greater confidence in Mrs. Coppin, and might occasionally be angry with Mrs. Dillon, yet there is no reason to conclude that he intended to make an unequal, and (what would seem to be) an unjust, distribution of his property. To his grand-children he was particularly attached: two of the Grays and two of the Coppins were resident with him for considerable portions of time.

It should have been noticed that for some years he had lived apart from his wife, who died in 1826; and that in early life he had had a natural daughter by Mary Deson, then a servant of his mother. After the death of that natural daughter Mary Deson continued to live as housekeeper, and in considerable favour with the deceased's mother; and on the death of the latter, Deson became the deceased's housekeeper, and so continued till his death. She was intrusted with the care of his grand-children, and was treated with respect by all the family, with the exception, possibly, of Mrs. Dillon. In June, 1829, the natural daughter married Mr. Bullock, a wine merchant at Bath, and in September, 1830, she died.

These are some of the facts and dates relating to the deceased's history, his property, and family, which may be material in the investigation of the present question. The remainder will appear as the Court proceeds to detail the testamentary and other acts of the deceased in relation to the disposition of his property.

It is alleged that in 1817 he executed a will, [364] but its contents are not before the Court. On the 31st of March, 1820, he executed another will, which has since been destroyed; but the drafts and instructions for it are produced. In that will he seems to have arranged his property specifically into three portions; one he gave as a provision to his wife for life, and then to his grand-children—the issue of Mrs. Gray; another portion he gave to his daughter Elizabeth, afterwards Mrs. Dillon; and the third to his daughter Ann Coppin; and Mr. Coppin was one of the trustees and executors of that will. If Elizabeth died without issue, her portion was given over to the grand-children by the other daughters, and the same provision was made with respect to the other portions; so that by the will of 1820 the property was secured finally on the grand-children.

To this will were added the several codicils, A, B, and C, now propounded.

Codicil A is dated on the 13th of December, 1827; it begins thus: "Whereas I, John Plura, &c., have duly executed my last will and testament the 31st of March, 1820, I declare this to be a codicil to my said last will." The codicil then gives a freehold house, No. 2 Gay Street, Bath, with appurtenances, to Mrs. Coppin for her life, and at her death to his grand-daughters, Elizabeth and Sarah Coppin; and it recites that he had made no settlement on Mrs. Coppin at her marriage, nor subsequently thereto, and directs the executors of his said will, viz. Charles Coppin, Ford, and Rogers, to pay Mrs. Coppin 200l. within a month after his death, free of legacy duty, and in case of her death before his said grand-daughters are 18, it directs his executors to manage the house for their advantage; it gives cer-[365]-tain linen and all the testator's apparel and printed books to Mrs. Coppin, and to his son-in-law, Coppin, his favourite violin. This paper was executed as a codicil in the presence of three witnesses.

The amount of the property bequeathed by this codicil is nearly 2500l. There are these words at the top: "June 18, 1830.—My will, John Plura." And there are these words at the bottom: "My will is revoked and destroyed. This is my will and desire, John Plura. June 18, 1830."

Codicil B, dated on the 29th of February, 1828, the deceased declares to be a codicil to his will of March 30th, 1820; but in the attestation clause it is stated to be a codicil to his will of 31st of March, 1820. By this codicil he disposes of property to the value nearly of 10,000l., of which 2000l. is realty. This disposition is principally in favour of his two grand-children, the Grays, with directions also to apply part of a fund arising from the sale of his prints, paintings, and articles of sculpture, towards the maintenance of his grandsons, John Coppin and Francis Gray, at college. This codicil was attested in the presence of three witnesses. It has these words at top: "June 18, 1830; my will, John Plura:" but there is nothing at the bottom of this instrument.

Codicil C bears date on the 4th of July, 1829, and, as it originally stood, was declared to be a codicil to his will, dated 31st of March, 1820. It gives to Mary Deson his household furniture, plate, &c., for life, or as long as she is unmarried, and a leasehold house. At the top, the words: "June, 1830, my will, John Plura," are struck through. At the top of the paper near the margin is written, "August 20th, 1831," and op-[366]-posite to this date in the margin are these further words: "This deed and testament, in the fear that being without a will at this time, my health may not allow me to make another." So that on the 20th of August, 1831, he speaks of himself as being without a will. There are, however, these words at the bottom: "My will of March 31, 1830, is revoked and destroyed, as not at all applicable to my estate and affairs, yet the purport of these two codicils I intend fully to form part of another will.—Jno. Plura. June 18, 1830." Whether the reference to the date of the will is erroneous or not, the Court has no evidence before it, but the attestation clause refers to a will of one thousand eight hundred and twenty-nine. This instrument has many alterations in the body, and particularly at the beginning.

These three papers are propounded as valid, and as in conjunction with two others, G and H, together containing the deceased's will. G, which is not testamentary in form, but is a deed of settlement dated on the 25th of August, 1831, is in effect as follows. It recites that no settlement was made on the marriage of Mr. and Mrs. Coppin; that Plura (the deceased) was possessed of a freehold house, 7 Queen's Parade, Bath, which Coppin was to hold on trust for his wife, to her separate use, and if he (Coppin) should survive, to his use, and on the death of the survivor, to their children. It further recites that the deceased had assigned to Mrs. Coppin, her executors, administrators, and assigns, 1904l., East India stock, and thirteen shares in the Globe Insurance Company, respectively, with the interest and dividends for her separate use, and on her death the interest and dividends to her husband, [367] if he survived, and afterwards the principal to their children; and directs his (Plura's) real and personal representatives to complete the necessary deeds and transfers of the said property; and in the mean time to pay the said rents, dividends, and interest to the persons for the time being entitled to receive the same. The amount of property so settled is under 8000l., of which nearly 2500l. is realty. This deed is executed in the presence of two witnesses, and its manifest object is to make a settlement upon Mr. and Mrs. Coppin and their children, as he had before done upon his other two daughters. The amount is not very different, considering the other daughters had the benefit of their settlements some years earlier.

H is the envelope, sealed with the deceased's seal, in which this deed of settlement was enclosed; a memorandum, as follows, was endorsed upon it:—"Papers concerning Mr. and Mrs. Coppin and their children, in regard of there being no settlement made on them at their marriage, and to be given up to Mrs. Coppin at my death, and immediately. Drawn by Mr. Evans, solicitor, Bath. Dated August 25th, 1831."

It may be proper also to notice that there is proof of other acts relating to the disposition of his property. The deceased, from the immense length of the will of 1820, which was prepared by a conveyancer, seems to have become inclined afterwards himself to be the framer of his testamentary acts. Codicils A, B, and C, though of considerable length, framed with much care, and regularly executed and attested, are of his own handwriting.

Again, in the early part of 1830 he executed a new will, also prepared by himself, consisting of several sheets of paper, and regularly attested by [368] three witnesses. One of the witnesses, Mr. Tull, an intimate friend, suggested to him the expediency of professional assistance, and still more strongly urged the precaution of a duplicate; and in a few days the deceased brought over a duplicate, or what he held out to be a re-copy, on account of an error, and this he formally executed in the presence of the same three witnesses. In the month of October in that year, upon the death of his natural daughter, Mrs. Bullock, as he stated it, he executed before the same witnesses a codicil recognizing his will. In August, 1831, having made the deed of settlement on Mrs. Coppin and her family, which deed was prepared by his solicitor, Mr. Evans, he in September executed a settlement or deed of gift prepared by the same solicitor, and making a provision for Mrs. Deson. That deed is not propounded, nor indeed produced, and Mrs. Deson seems satisfied of its validity and legal operation. Whether this is the deed alluded to in the margin of paper C is not proved; that memorandum is of an earlier date than the execution of either of the deeds; but at that time he considered himself as without a will, and the will executed early in the year 1830, and the codicil of October in that year, are not forthcoming, and must be presumed to have been destroyed by the deceased himself.

After this period and the execution of these deeds he was evidently making preparation in his mind for a new will; it does not appear that he ever committed any instructions to writing, for none are preserved; yet he repeatedly mentioned to Mr. Evans his intention of coming to him to make his will, but he procrastinated, saying he was not yet ready, till at length he was unexpectedly [369] attacked by a seizure, which rendered him incapable, and in a few days ended in his death. These appear to be the several facts relating to the deceased himself in his lifetime.

At the time of the deceased's death Mr. Coppin was at Bath, and coming to his house the next morning, he, together with Mrs. Deson and Mr. Bullock, opened the iron chest or safe, in order to see whether the deceased had left any directions about his funeral. Finding A and B, which were only codicils, and lying uppermost, rolled up together, the idea occurred that, as other parts of the family were absent, it might be proper to wait for the presence of some indifferent persons. Accordingly, two very intimate friends of the deceased, Mr. Bally and Mr. Rogers, the latter one of the executors in the will, were sent for, and by their advice the repositories were sealed up, and so remained till after the funeral. Mr. Coppin certainly did not, at the time, mention to these friends that he had opened the iron chest in this cursory way, and for the purpose already stated; but this omission is far too slight a circumstance to raise even a suspicion of fraud, and much less to found a charge of spoliation, perjury, and forgery.

The question then comes back to this—whether assuming that these codicils, A, B, and C, are in the same plight and condition as they were left by the deceased they are valid as a testamentary disposition, or whether the deceased is dead intestate.

Primâ facie, as originally executed, they can have no testamentary effect. A and B are expressly codicils to a will of 1820; that will was revoked and destroyed, and, primâ facie, that revocation and destruction put an end to the codicils. On A he writes, "My will is revoked and de-[370]-stroyed;" and on C the same at the bottom, and at the top, at a still later period, namely, in Aug. 1831—"being without a will at this time;" and codicil C, as I have before noticed, refers in the attestation clause to a will of 1829, not merely in figures but in words. Whether that was a blunder of the deceased (for he had then become far advanced in years, and was not in good health), or whether there was a will executed by him in 1829, may be uncertain; but if there were a will in 1829, the execution of that will would be a presumed revocation of the former will, and of these codicils, as originally executed. Can it be contended, from what is written on each of the papers of the date of "18th June, 1830," that the Court, looking to all the circumstances, is to conclude that this old gentleman had finally determined that these papers should now become his operative will, and that these memoranda should be a re-execution of them as his will? Why, this is negatived by what at a later period, viz. in August, 1831, he writes on codicil C, "being without a will at this time." What was passing in his mind it may be difficult to conjecture—it is at least so far doubtful as to open the case to the admission of circumstances, in order to arrive at the deceased's intention.

It is said the words "my will" can bear no other construction; but no words could be stronger than the concluding part of the instrument in Mathews v. Warner,(a) "I appoint my good friend Mr. Edward Lepine, and my good friend Mr. Edward [371] Johnson, my executors, to see this, my last will and testament complied with." Dated at Deptford, 2d October, 1785, and signed "William Mathews." True it is that at the commencement Mathews states he was only framing the "plan of a will, to be afterwards drawn out in a more formal manner;" yet at the end he might have intended to convert it into his will, at least for a time. No words, I repeat, could be stronger than the passage I have quoted, to shew that he meant that very instrument to operate. The Prerogative Court (in deference to a decision of the Supreme Court in a former case) and the Court of Delegates held that affixing his signature was a permanent execution, and that that was conclusively established on the face of the paper. The Commission of Review, however, held that this description, "a plan to be afterwards drawn out," opened the case to the admission of evidence as to the intention with which the signature was affixed, and the continuance thereof at the death. If the deceased, Mathews, had died suddenly, immediately after writing this plan, it is possible that its validity would have been established, for then the inference might have been that the more formal drawing out was only prevented by the act of God; but he lived long after, and the paper was ultimately pronounced, by the Commission of Review, not to be his will. So, in the present case, if the deceased had died immediately after he had, on 18th June, 1830, written "my will," and subscribed his name, the construction might possibly have been that he meant at least that so much of his intention as the papers conveyed should be carried into effect, and that he had written these words to guard against the accident of immediate death; but, having lived fifteen [372] months afterwards, it is impossible to hold that he intended to set up and adhere to these papers as his permanent will duly executed—at least it is open to the Court to look into all the circumstances to ascertain whether they warrant such a conclusion.

(a) 4 Burn, Ecc. Law, p. 107, d.; 4 Ves. jun. 186. See also this case commented upon in Fawcet v. Jones and Pulteny, 3 Phill. 477; in Beaty v. Beaty, 1 Add. 160, in notis; in Mitchell v. Mitchell, 2 Hagg. Ecc. 75; Hattatt v. Hattatt, sup. 212.

What, then, are the circumstances of this case? In the first place, these papers apply only to a small part of the deceased's property, and only to certain branches of his family; but, by his will of 1820, he had most carefully disposed of the whole of his property—a very considerable one—taking care that it should ultimately all centre in his grand-children, but providing for his two surviving daughters during their lives. This will of 1820 was adhered to for ten years, and confirmed by three instruments, originally executed as codicils, and which were regularly drawn up in his own hand-writing, and executed and attested in the most formal manner. The memoranda to which I have adverted on these instruments are to be regarded as merely formal and explanatory endorsements; they are not attested in order to operate as a re-publication of his will, or as a permanent substantive disposition of his property, but are mere precautionary memoranda, and expressions indicative of some future intention.

But, further, the deceased executed other formal testamentary instruments, not only subsequent to the dates of the three codicils, but even subsequent to the 18th of June, 1830. In the course of that year he executed a long and formal new will; whether in the spring before the 18th of June, or after, does not appear, for the witnesses have nothing by which to fix the exact date; but he also, after the 18th of June, 1830, with equal formality, executed a codicil, and of this the witnesses can fix [373] the date, as it was made in consequence of Mr. Bullock's death, and that event did not take place till the 9th of September in that year. This will and codicil of 1830, written by the deceased himself, both executed formally, and both in the presence of the same witnesses, appear to me wholly inconsistent with an intention or understanding on the part of the deceased that what he had written upon these old codicils would set them up as a substantive, valid, operative will. It is nearly incredible that he should so have considered these papers.

The matter, however, does not even rest here; for Mr. Plura seems to have taken other modes of effecting his purpose; and to have substituted other instruments in the place of these codicils. He had made no settlement on Mrs. Coppin's marriage; that is so recited in A, the first codicil to the will of 1820, and is the reason assigned for giving Mr. Coppin the benefit of a life-interest, in case he should survive his wife. The benefit to Mrs. Coppin is increased by the codicil of December, 1827. This was written after the death of the deceased's wife; but in August, 1831, he, considering himself as without any will, executed a deed of settlement, making this increased provision for Mrs. Coppin, then for her husband, if he should survive, and afterwards for their children; placing them, therefore, in some degree on an equal footing with the other two daughters, on whom a settlement, to a similar effect, had been made on their marriage. It may, then, be concluded that this settlement of August, 1831, was a substitution for the special benefit he had intended for the Coppins by the codicil A, and not an addition to it.

The same inference arises in regard to codicil C. The deceased, not attributing any effect to what [374] he had written upon that paper on the 18th of June, 1830, had, in August, 1831, taken the trouble to alter that instrument into something of a draft for a new will; but instead of carrying those alterations into effect by a testamentary instrument, he adopted the same course as in the case of the Coppins—he had a deed of gift prepared by his solicitor, which he executed in October in that year. This, again, was a substitution for C. That he should then regard the instruments A, B, C as his will is beyond all belief: and the marginal writing on paper C, as well as the writing at the bottom of it—"being without a will at this time" (viz., in August, 1831)—necessarily shewing that he considered that he had then no existing will, confirms the inference from the other papers. That opinion is further confirmed by the evidence of the solicitor, Mr. Evans, who states that the deceased was contemplating and preparing in his mind the arrangement of his new will, but he had not made up his mind; he was "not ready;" and as his property was of a variety of sorts, and if the deceased contemplated (as he probably might) the arrangement of it in specific proportions among the three branches of his family (as in his will of 1820), some time would be required for estimating the different values, and the different advances made to, and the circumstances of, the several members of his family. It is not, then, extraordinary that the deceased, at his advanced age, and in a state of indifferent health, had not quite prepared himself, and was "not ready" to give Mr. Evans detailed instructions for his new will: but that does not lead to the inference that he had not the intention to make an entire new will, still less that he considered the papers A, B, and C as his will.

[375] It so happens that intestacy will nearly carry into effect what appears to have been the principle, though perhaps not the exact detail, of the deceased's wishes —viz., that the property should be divided pretty equally among the three branches of his family: at all events, it is, in my judgment, the duty of the Court, upon grounds to which I have referred, and which it is unnecessary to recapitulate, to pronounce against the papers propounded; and that, so far as appears, the deceased is dead intestate.

The costs of the suit were respectively prayed out of the estate.

Per Curiam. In this case each party has an ample provision, and I shall leave them respectively to pay their own costs. The suit has been conducted hostilely. Charges, by no means necessary, and by no means established, have been alleged against Mr. Coppin; and the substitute of Mrs. Dillon's proctor, at Bath, the proctor himself being unable to attend, framed and caused to be administered nearly one hundred interrogatories. I shall not, therefore, direct the costs to be paid out of the estate; such an expectation sometimes induces expences which might well be avoided; and it is certainly not an application to be resorted to and granted as a matter of course. Were the Court, in this instance, to decree the costs out of the estate, they would, in some measure, fall on the grand-children, who are not parties to the expence.

Costs "out of the estate" refused.

3d Session.—On this day an application was made that the letters of administration should be granted to Mrs. [376] Coppin solely; the grand-children concurred in this application. On the other hand, the administration was claimed by Mrs. Dillon, as the deceased's eldest daughter, and as having successfully opposed the papers and established an intestacy.

Per Curiam. The Court never forces a joint administration; (a) and when it recollects the mode in which this suit was conducted on the part of the Dillons, it cannot be surprised that Mrs. Coppin should be disinclined to be joined in an administration with her sister: it is not likely that they could act cordially together. The parties are equally entitled, for though, cæteris paribus, the Court might decree the grant to Mrs. Dillon, as the eldest sister, yet that does not give her any very decided advantage; while, on the other side, there are two interests against one; and a majority of interests always has its weight. It is also manifest in this case that the deceased gave a preference to, and had greater confidence in, Mr. Coppin; he was always one of his executors: this intimation of the deceased's wish and of his confidence is a strong circumstance; and on that ground principally I decree the administration to Mrs. Coppin.

(a) Dampier v. Colson, 2 Phill. 64.

Lushington for Mrs. Dillon, prayed that the securities might be directed to justify.

Per Curiam. The application being made on behalf of a next of kin, I must grant it; but it will be sufficient for the sureties to justify, in respect of the share of the party excluded from the administration.

[377] BARNES v. M'BRIDE. Prerogative Court, Hil. Term, 1st Session, 1833.—A will was propounded on behalf of an asserted widow and children, and was opposed by a first cousin; the interest of the opposer was denied; the proxy was "to propound the will and to do all things necessary, and touching the validity thereof," no allegation propounding the will was given in, but witnesses were examined on an allegation pleading the marriage: the first cousin declared that she proceeded no further; the Court, under such circumstances, refused to pronounce the allegation proved; and, as no allegation propounding the will had been given in, decreed probate only in common form.

This was a cause of proving the will of Joseph Dawson, who died in Ireland in January, 1832. In early life he went as surgeon to Africa; he there became a merchant, and ultimately Governor of Cape Coast Castle. In 1807 he married at that station (according to the rites and ceremonies then in force in that part of Western Africa) Mrs. Mould, a native of Africa, and the widow of a governor of Cape Coast Castle. Mr. Dawson made several wills; the last was in duplicate, and was dated "Cape Coast Town, Africa; the 28th of February, 1825." By this will, after reciting that his son was in England, and that he (the testator) was about to return to this country with two of his daughters, and after providing for Sarah Dawson, "the mother of his four children," and recommending her to "the kind and friendly attention of his executors in Africa," he bequeathed the bulk of his property to his children; and appointed two executors in Africa, and Mr. Barnes executor in England.

Mrs. Dawson and the children survived the testator.

The deceased left 10,000l. and upwards in the English funds, besides property in Ireland, and on the coast of Africa.

The will of 1825 being opposed by Agnes M'Bride, spinster, it was propounded by Mr. Barnes. A proxy was exhibited for him, in virtue whereof his proctor admitted that M'Bride was the deceased's first cousin, once removed; but otherwise denied her interest. The proxy also [378] authorized the proctor "to propound the last will of the deceased, to give in an allegation propounding the same, and to do all things proper and necessary touching the validity of the said will, and the obtaining probate thereof."

No allegation propounding the will was given in; but an allegation, pleading the testator's marriage with Mrs. Mould, according to the forms used at Cape Coast, and also pleading cohabitation, birth of children, reputation and acknowledgment, was given in, and it was admitted without opposition. Upon this allegation three witnesses were examined, who proved the mode of marriage at Cape Coast, the cohabitation of Mr. and Mrs. Dawson as man and wife, the reputation and acknowledgment of them in that character, and the birth of children, but the fact of marriage was not proved.

On the caveat day in January the proctor for M'Bride exhibited a special proxy, and declared that he proceeded no further. Publication of the evidence was decreed upon the same day, and the cause assigned for sentence on the first session.

Phillimore and Lushington for the executor. The evidence establishes the validity of the marriage and the legitimacy of the children. The executor, therefore, is anxious that the Court should not merely decree probate of the will, but should pronounce that the allegation is proved, and prevent any question that might otherwise arise as to the payment of legacy duties.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. The Court is pressed to pronounce the allegation proved, which would, in effect, be to pronounce [379] the marriage proved: this would be an extreme irregularity. The whole tenor of the proceedings is to prove the will, and such is the form and extent of the proxies. As soon as the cousin, whose interest was denied, declared by her proctor that she proceeded no further, there was an end of the opposition, and the executor might instantly have taken probate: but he cannot call upon the Court to pronounce that this allegation, pleading the marriage, is proved; for there is no party before the Court denying it, nor even any party cited: more especially now that the validity of the will is not questioned, the marriage thereby becomes immaterial in the present suit, since the will provides for the widow under the description of the mother of his children. The clearest proof of a marriage thus introduced into a testamentary cause would not bar an adverse interest; nor can I pronounce a sentence purporting to have an effect which it would not legally have. However, I will allow the matter to stand over till the next session.

2d Session.—Per Curiam. I have considered the application made in this case on the last session, but I am quite satisfied that I cannot pronounce the allegation proved; and as the will has not been set up in plea and been proved, I can only grant probate of it to the executor, in common form.

[380] ABBOT v. PETERS. Prerogative Court, Hil. Term, 2nd Session, 1833.—A paper beginning "This is the last will and testament of me, Charles Abbot, made this 25th of January, 1831," and concluding, "in witness whereof I have, to this my last will and testament, set my hand and seal, the day and year first above written," but which was not subscribed nor sealed (the deceased having lived sixteen months after the same was written), pronounced against as unfinished and abandoned.

Charles Abbot, a widower, was found dead in his bed on the 21st of May, 1832. He left 5000l., of which 1000l. was realty. Two sons and five daughters survived him. A testamentary paper (and there was no other) was found in his custody at his death: it was in his own hand-writing, pretty fairly written, and it contained a full disposition of his property. The paper commenced thus—"This is the last will and testament of me, Charles Abbot, of Longaston, in the county of Somerset, gentleman, made this twenty-fifth day of January, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-one." By it the testator gave 2400l. in trust to his eldest son, and to Mr. Peters, his son-in-law, to apply the interest for the maintenance and education of his four unmarried daughters, until the youngest should attain twenty-one, and then the principal to be equally divided; 300l. to his daughter, Mrs. Peters; 500l. to his youngest son; and the residue of his property to his eldest son, his sole executor, and appointed him and Mrs. Peters guardians of his said four daughters. The paper then had these words—"In witness whereof I have, to this my last will and testament, contained in one sheet of paper, set my hand and seal, the day and year first above written."

There was no seal nor subscription. At the foot of the paper the deceased had inserted the amount of the four legacies, and erased the word "pounds" after each, adding "This is written in different ink.—C. A."

[381] The allegation propounding this paper on behalf of the eldest son, the heir at law and executor, pleaded, in addition to the history already stated, that the deceased, soon after the death of his wife in July, 1830, declared to his father and mother that he had taken care of his daughters; and also that on the marriage of his daughter with Peters, in September, 1830, he had told him that the money, viz. 300l., which he had with his wife would be deducted at his death, and that all the girls would have alike.

Addams and Haggard for an intestacy.

Phillimore and Blake contrà.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. This is clearly an unfinished paper: it professes to dispose of real property and to appoint guardians; and the Court cannot read the contents of the instrument, and particularly the concluding part, without being satisfied that the deceased himself intended to do something more to it. The concluding clause is to this effect: "In witness whereof, &c., I have hereunto set my hand and seal;" but the deceased neither set his hand nor his seal. The paper is dated in January, 1831, and the deceased died in May, 1832—thus elapsed sixteen months after the instrument bears date. The Court, therefore, is bound to presume that the paper was abandoned—to pronounce that it is invalid, and, as far as appears, that the deceased is dead intestate. As, however, it was necessary to take the opinion of the Court upon it, I decree the costs out of the estate.

[382] SALMON AND BREESE v. HAYS. Prerogative Court, Hil. Term, 2nd Session, 1833.—An allegation, pleading a paper, beginning "Elizabeth Mary Hays" (dated at the top, six months before her death, and disposing of all her property), but not subscribed, and ending without a stop, written on a half-sheet very fairly, without erasure, interlineation, or abbreviation, but containing no words to shew, on the one hand, any intention of doing any thing further; nor, on the other hand, that she had finished it—admitted to proof—the Court reserving all questions to the final sentence.—A feme covert having made a will of her separate property, but appointed no executor, the Court refused to grant a limited administration, with the paper annexed, to the legatees therein named, but according to the course of office granted a general administration, cum testamento annexo, to the husband.

Elizabeth Mary Hays, late wife of John Hays, had, under the will of her first husband, Jacob Breese, the interest and dividends of certain property secured to her separate use and benefit for her life; and from and after her decease the executors and trustees were directed to pay 500l. to his children, "in such shares and proportions, if to more than one, either absolutely or conditionally, and in such way, manner, and form, as his said dear wife should, by her last will and testament, in writing, or any writing, in the nature of or purporting to be, a will, give, direct, limit, appoint, or dispose of the same; and in default of such appointment, to pay the same to such person or persons, as at the decease of my said wife shall be my next of kin." Mr. Breese died in February, 1807, and upon the death of his widow (afterwards Mrs. Hays), on the 11th of September, 1832, there was found, in a letter-case in her escrutoire, together with a copy of Breese's will, the following paper in her own hand writing:—

"February 23, 1832.

"I, Elizabeth Mary Hays, give and bequeath to my two daughters, Clara Salmon and Emma Breese, equally, or the surviving one, all the property I possess in right of their late father. I leave my pearl necklace and bracelets, in the red morocco case, to Elizabeth Hays, my daughter; all my other jewels, of whatever description, to be divided equally between all my daughters, viz. [383] Clara Salmon, Emma Breese, Elizabeth Hays, Susanna Hays, and Matilda Hays; except my diamond brooch, which I bequeath to my son Albert Hays. Any other property I may possess, to be divided equally between all and every one of the surviving children of both marriages, unless those of the latter marriage, by John Hays, should not be so well provided for by him; in which case it is to be equally divided between his, the said John Hays', four children. Should the 500l. at my disposal be considered as my own property, it is to be shared equally by all the children of both marriages. My watch, chain, and seals to Clara Salmon, provided she has not got one; if she has, the watch to Susannah Hays, and the chain and seals to Elizabeth Hays."

This paper was propounded in an allegation as the deceased's will, and opposed by the husband.

Lushington for the husband.

Addams contrà.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. The paper propounded is not signed, and it ends without even a stop. The question then is whether it is a finished or an unfinished instrument; that is, whether the deceased intended to do any thing more to it, or to write out another; or whether she intended and considered that this instrument should and would operate in its present form. If it should appear that the deceased intended to do any thing further to this paper, it is invalid; for it was written above six months before her death, and there is nothing pleaded to account for the want of progress; and in such a view of the case it must be considered [384] as originally deliberative only, and at length an abandoned instrument. On the other hand, if it should appear that she had done every thing she meant to do to the paper, and that she considered it would operate in its present form, that would be sufficient; for the law requires no particular form for a disposition of personal property. Some of the circumstances lead to and bear opposite conclusions and inferences.

The instrument is upon half a sheet of letter paper: this looks more like a draft than a final dispositive instrument; but, on the other hand, it is very fairly and fully written, without a single erasure or interlineation, or abbreviation; there is not even an initial. It is true that she writes her name at the beginning of the paper, having dated it at the top; but writing a name at the beginning of a testamentary instrument, however it may serve to authenticate the writing, does not enable the Court to infer that it was a finished paper, and signed for the purpose of giving it operation and effect. Yet, on the other hand again, there are no words, either in the body or at the conclusion of the paper, to shew, as in the last case (supra, 380), that the deceased intended to do any thing further to it: there is no reference to an executor to be appointed; there is no attestation clause, no words such as "in witness whereof," &c., nor even the single word "witness." It is far from being an uncommon impression that a disposition of personal property, in the handwriting of a deceased, will necessarily operate and take effect without any formality; and here the paper might have been left open, without a signature, in order [385] that the writer, who herself might not doubt of its validity, might add any little further bequests of memorials to her friends. The circumstance that this paper was found in conjunction with the will of her first husband only shews that when she composed it she set about making her will in a formal manner; but it will not shew that she had done all that she intended, and had finished it.

The paper certainly does dispose of all that she had a right to dispose of, and possibly, indeed, of somewhat more; as it may be that in respect to the bequest of the 500l. she had only a right of appointment among the children of the first marriage. Upon the whole, then, of the case, as at present before the Court, it is a matter of considerable doubt and difficulty to decide whether the deceased did intend this paper to operate. As far as any inference can be drawn from the disposition itself, it is favourable to the instrument. The probability is that the deceased would wish the property to go equally among the children of both, and not exclusively to her second husband, especially as it came from her first. On this last consideration the inclination of my opinion is that the paper may eventually be established. It has been truly observed that there is not a single recognition of this instrument pleaded; possibly something of that kind may hereafter be ascertained, or some further facts may come out which may solve the difficulties in which the case is at present involved, or some arrangement may take place between the husband and the daughters of the first marriage, which may, by consent, put an end to the question. Abstaining, then, from expressing any decided opinion as to the ultimate [386] result, and reserving all questions, I allow the allegation to go to proof.

The allegation having been admitted, the husband declared that he should proceed no further in his opposition to the paper; whereupon, at the petition of the daughters by the first marriage, the Court was moved to decree administration to them with the will annexed, "limited so far only as concerns all the right, title, and interest of the deceased in and to such effects as she had a right to dispose of and hath disposed of by her said will."

Addams in support of the act on petition. Mrs. Hays, by her will, has given all the property which she possessed, in respect of her first husband, to her daughters, Mrs. Salmon and Miss Breese; they are then entitled to be preferred in the grant of administration, with their mother's will annexed. Besides, Mr. Hays, the husband, has opposed the validity of the will.

Lushington contrà for Mr. Hays. The general rule is, where a feme covert makes a will in respect of property over which she has a disposing power, and does not appoint an executor, that administration, with the will annexed, is granted to the surviving husband, if he is willing to take it. In Ross v. Ewer (3 Atk. 160. See also 1 Williams on Executors, p. 245) Lord Chancellor Hardwicke states that such was the general course of practice in the Ecclesiastical Court; and so, I apprehend, it remains. This case offers no circumstances to induce the Court to deviate from this its usual practice. The husband opposed the paper to see whether it would be considered perfect or imperfect; but as soon as the Court intimated the [387] inclination of its opinion he withdrew his opposition. It is a mere assumption to state that the deceased has given all the property which she derived from her first husband to the children by him; I admit that the relative proportions to the legatees under the will may be a question of construction, but, for the purposes of the present question, the husband of the deceased, and the four children of their marriage (now minors) must be taken to be the parties principally benefited. It is not clear what property, either in extent or description, may pass under this will. But I principally ground my resistance to this application of the daughters on the general rule and practice of the Court.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. The practice of the Court has been correctly stated that where there is no appointment of an executor in a feme covert's will, the husband is, generally, entitled to the administration with that will annexed; and I see no reason for a deviation in this case from the ordinary course of practice. It was necessary for the husband to take the opinion of the Court, in the first instance, on the validity of the paper, and upon that point the Court having intimated but a doubtful opinion, he yet withdrew his opposition, as soon as the allegation was admitted. Mr. Hays now, as the husband, and also as the father of four of the legatees, claims this administration, and why should he not take it? What would be the effect if the Court rejected him? It might lead to two distinct grants—the one limited to the two daughters, the other to the husband; because, if the wife has left [388] any other property than that over which she had and has exercised a disposing power, the husband will be clearly entitled to have a cæterorum grant.(a) But I see no reason to pass him over: a general grant to the husband, of administration with the paper annexed, will be conformable to the ordinary practice; he is a responsible person: no inconvenience or injury can result from such a grant to the daughters of the first marriage, and I therefore decree to the husband a general administration cum testamento annexo.

The proctor for the daughters applied for the sureties to justify.

Per Curiam. It is always the duty of the Court to take care that there is sufficient security. Let the sureties justify.

DINGLE v. DINGLE. Prerogative Court, Hil. Term, 2nd Session, 1833.—Allegation propounding instructions for a will, signed by the deceased, and written twenty months before his death, rejected, nothing being pleaded to shew that the completion of a more formal will was prevented; the presumption of law that the deceased had abandoned the disposition being strengthened by his conduct; and the alleged declarations of adherence being too loose to repel the presumption.

This was a business of proving a paper as the will of John Dingle, victualler, promoted against his widow by the guardian of Susanna Dingle, a minor, and one of the residuary legatees. The paper was drawn up in the form of instructions for a will; it contained a full disposition of the deceased's property; it gave 500l. extra to his daughter Susanna, above mentioned, appointed his two brothers executors, and concluded in the manner following:—"The above are Instructions for my Will. 7th April, 1831. (Signed) John Dingle." The personalty was about 3000l.

[389] The allegation in substance pleaded, first, the death of John Dingle on the 7th of December, 1832, leaving a widow and three daughters, minors, of whom Susanna was by his first wife.

2. The deceased's marriage to a second wife (now his widow) in August, 1823; frequent declarations of his dissatisfaction and disappointment at not receiving 1500l. with her, and that he thought it would be right, until such property was secured to him, to tie up a large part of what he possessed in favour of his daughter Susanna.

3. That on the 5th of November, 1823, the deceased, accompanied by his sister, consulted Mr. Hird, a solicitor, on the subject of benefiting his daughter Susanna to the extent of half his property, which he then estimated at upwards of 3000l., declaring, as pleaded in the second article; that Hird accordingly prepared from Dingle's dictation a will, which appointed Mr. Hill and Mr. Shears executors; that Dingle signed the will, and took it away with him; that no draft was made, and the will itself cannot now be found: that he desired his sister to keep the matter secret, adding, "if I get my wife's money, I can alter my will at any time;" that he informed Hill what he had done for Susanna, and also enjoined secrecy.

4. That in the spring of 1830, having several children (two infants died in May, 1831), he declared to Hill and to others that he must alter his will, but still that he should do most for his daughter Susanna.

5. That on 7th of April, 1831, he gave verbal instructions to Mr. Lydden, a solicitor, for a will; that the same being read over and approved were [390] signed by the deceased at the recommendation of Mr. Lydden, who stated that in case any thing should happen to him (Dingle) without his executing a more formal will, the paper would stand valid as a will; that on this occasion he talked to Mr. Lydden of his disappointment at not receiving the fortune he (Dingle) had expected with his then wife.

6. Pleaded the handwriting of the subscription.

(a) Boxley v. Stubington, 1 Cases temp. Sir Geo. Lee, 540. Also see 1 Williams on Executors, p. 212.

7. That in May, Mr. Lydden wrote to the deceased requesting him to call and execute his will; that this letter was received and opened by his wife; that the deceased never became acquainted with the contents of it, or, believing that the signed instructions would stand valid, did not call: that in November, in the course of an interview between Mr. Lydden, jun., and the deceased, upon other business, the subject of the will was mentioned, when the deceased saying that he supposed the paper, which he had signed, would stand valid, Lydden recommended him, in order to avoid a possibility of disputes, to execute a fair copy, but the deceased appeared to be satisfied in his own mind that the paper of the 7th of April would operate.

8. Declarations after the 7th of April, 1831, and in 1832, to several persons, particularly to his brother Robert (to whom before the 7th of April, 1831, he had applied to be one of his executors), that he had made his will, appointed his two brothers executors, and given his daughter, Susanna, 500l. more than to his other children; and that the deceased never departed from such intended bequest.

9. That no part of the property Dingle expected with his second wife was ever paid.

[391] 10. That the paper propounded, after it was signed, remained in Mr. Lydden's possession.

Addams for the widow, opposed the allegation.

The King's advocate contrà.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. This allegation is offered for the purpose of propounding a paper as the will of John Dingle, deceased: the paper is drawn up in the form of instructions; it contains a full disposition of the deceased's property, appoints executors, and concludes thus: "The above are instructions for my will, 7th April, 1831;" and it is signed "John Dingle." These instructions, then, were given in April, 1831, and the death of the deceased does not take place till December, 1832—a year and eight months after. The paper then is, upon the face of it, invalid, for although signed, yet the signature is only to authenticate the paper as instructions, or to give it validity in case of Mr. Dingle's death, before his will could with reasonable diligence be prepared; but a signing of instructions does not, primâ facie, supersede the necessity of executing a will (Munro v. Coutts, 1 Dow. P. C. 437). There are cases where, from all the circumstances, it has been collected that instructions were at all events intended to operate, if the deceased should not execute a will in a formal way, but that intention is to be collected from circumstances, and every case must, as to intention, rest on its own circumstances taken altogether.

To ascertain intention, conduct supplies the safest ground of inference; and here it was the [392] deceased's clear intention to do a further act—to execute a will; and he had abundant opportunity of completing his intention, for he lived a year and eight months after the instructions were drawn out; and no reason is pleaded to account for the non-completion of his original intention to execute a formal will.

This conduct of the deceased implies an abandonment of the disposition, in the same manner as when there is an attestation clause to a will and the testator gives no explanation why he does not execute the will in the presence of witnesses.

The solicitor understood that what he drew out in April were only instructions, and that a will was to be prepared; he accordingly did prepare a will, and wrote to Mr. Dingle, informing him that the will was ready for execution, yet the deceased took no steps to finish it; he never saw the instructions after they were first given, and consequently had no opportunity of revising them.

The legal presumption, then, confirmed by the inference from the deceased's whole conduct, is that he abandoned the testamentary disposition which he contemplated in April, 1831; and that these instructions are consequently invalid.

The question, then, is whether this presumption, arising upon the face of the paper itself, and confirmed by the deceased's conduct, is repelled by mere loose declarations; for the matters pleaded in the second, third, and fourth articles of the allegation are so remote in their history that if the allegation were to go to proof, they could not bear materially upon the case: and in respect to mere declarations, they are very unsafe evidence, being often misapprehended, misrepresented, or not ac-[393]-curately recollected, and are not unfrequently insincere. The Court at all times is very cautious of placing any reliance on them. The declaration of the solicitor pleaded in the fifth article, at the time he took the instructions, "that the instructions would stand valid as a will in case any thing should happen to the deceased, without his executing a more formal will," could only mean "if any thing should shortly happen, and before a more formal will should be ready for execution"—it could not mean that the instructions were a substitute for a will, thus rendering a more formal execution of the disposition of his property unnecessary. This is the necessary construction of the observation of the solicitor, when coupled with his subsequent conduct, otherwise, why did he prepare a will? It would be dangerous to trust, then, to such a conversation, in order to rebut the presumption of law.

Again, what is further pleaded in the seventh article is still more loose: the deceased declined to execute his will, though told that it might avoid doubts; he appeared to be satisfied that the instructions would operate. The Court can only with safety rely on his conduct: the deceased is reminded of his will—of the risk in not executing it—and yet he takes no steps to execute it. The inference, therefore, is that he had either abandoned altogether his testamentary instructions, or that he was re-considering them. Again, the declarations in the eighth article are merely of a general nature, pleaded apparently in order to take the chance of any being deposed to by the witnesses: no person, except the brother, is vouched in this article, nor even with respect to him is there any satisfactory [394] specification as to time. The declarations, then, amount to nothing; and I repeat that the Court cannot be too cautious in attending to mere declarations when opposed to conduct.

In the present case the deceased gave instructions for his will, and lived a year and eight months without taking any further step to complete his testamentary act, and nothing is pleaded to shew that he was prevented: therefore the legal presumption is, that he was dissatisfied with the instructions, and had abandoned them; nor can this presumption be repelled by mere probability and conjecture.

Allegation rejected.

RIND v. DAVIES. Prerogative Court, Hil. Term, 3rd Session, 1833.—A sole executor and legatee in a pretended will, having been cited to propound the same, admitted to sue in formâ pauperis, though the paper was not produced till after a long lapse of time, and other circumstances of suspicion and vexation had appeared.—On the merits, the Court pronounced against the will, and condemned the pauper in costs; but intimated that it should not proceed to enforce a monition for payment thereof unless he ceased to be a pauper.

This case respected an asserted will of Thomas Jones, late of Llantisilio Hall, in the county of Denbigh, Esq., in which a preliminary point was raised regarding the admission, as a pauper, of the party setting up the will. The proceedings were as follows:—

Thomas Jones died on the 30th of November, 1820, a bachelor, possessed of real estate of 1500l. per annum, and of personalty valued at 18,000l. After various advertisements for the discovery of any will made by the deceased, administration, in February, 1822, as being intestate, was granted to Charlotte Evans, widow, his second cousin and only next of kin. In 1824, 1826, and 1827, respectively, further letters of administration of the deceased's unadministered effects were granted, until Mrs. Rind, widow, one of the [395] parties in the cause, as the daughter, and a residuary legatee in the will of Charlotte Evans, became the deceased's personal representative. A monition then issued on the part of Joseph Davies, calling upon Benj. Capper to bring into and leave in the registry of this Court the will of the deceased, dated the 12th of September, 1816, executed in the presence of three witnesses, and in which Davies was executor and sole legatee. In Easter Term, 1828, the instrument was brought in; and no steps being taken by Davies to obtain probate thereof, Mrs. Rind, in March, 1831, in order to enable herself legally to complete the administration of Thomas Jones' effects, caused a decree to issue, citing Davies to prove this will, or shew cause why the deceased should not be pronounced to have died intestate; whereupon Davies appeared, and prayed to be admitted a pauper: this being objected to, he was assigned counsel and proctor to support his application; and after an act on petition had been entered into, and affidavits exhibited on either side, the question came on upon the by-day after Trinity Term, 1831.

Lushington for Mrs. Rind.

Curteis contrà, was stopped by the Court.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. The only question at present is whether Joseph Davies is a pauper: he is called upon (at the instance of the party who objects to such his admission) by the regular process of the Court to propound and prove, in solemn form of law, a certain paper, purporting to be a will, in which he is named the executor. He appears and [396] declares himself ready to propound it; but alleges himself to be a pauper, and unable to proceed in the suit except as a pauper. Is he, then, entitled to sue in that character? for all the conversations and letters referred to in the petition, and tending to shew that some other person is behind, supporting Davies in this matter, can hardly be gone into. The Court cannot, for instance, make Hiller (who is described as Davies's agent, and assisting him with money and advice) a party, nor condemn him in costs, if Davies should fail in his suit: and it must not be forgotten, if the point were material, that Davies throughout denies the privity of Hiller in this business. Again, it is admitted to be an absolute necessity that the claim of this man as executor should be disposed of; and in what way can he propound the will but as a pauper? He is the sole party to take that step; were it otherwise, and it should appear that, of several parties entitled to propound the paper, this man was put forward for that purpose as a pauper, the Court would strongly endeavour to defeat such an attempt, and prevent a contest upon such unequal terms. The will is not brought forward till after a long lapse of time; (a)[1] it also may make its [397] appearance in a very suspicious form—there may have been proceedings in other Courts tending to confirm that suspicion—the present proceeding to set up this will may be very vexatious—but the party is cited to propound, thereby admitting that at the date of the decree there was nothing to preclude him; and if he has not the means (and the affidavits on behalf of Mrs. Rind state that he has become paralytic, and is in part supported by the parish), the law must allow him the means. It is not very probable that he will ever be able to prove this will; but, there being nothing set up as a bar to his propounding it, the Court cannot, upon the mere improbability of the story, preclude him from the attempt.

The Court overruled the petition, and admitted Davies a pauper.

Allegations on either side were afterwards given in, and the evidence extended to a considerable length; and on the third session of this term the Court (after hearing Curteis in support of the will, and Lushington and Haggard contrà, that there was not only a failure of proof, but were also various circumstances from whence to infer that the will was a forgery supported by perjury) pronounced against the asserted will, observing: The evidence leads strongly to the conclusion that the signature to this instrument is not the signature of the deceased; and that no such transaction as has been attempted to be proved ever [398] occurred; in every step the history amounts to improbability—to incredibility. If Davies were not a pauper, I should have no hesitation in pronouncing against this paper with costs; but, though a pauper, the Court, in order to mark its view of the case, condemns him in the costs; it being a matter of discretion whether the Court, unless he should cease to be a pauper, would proceed to enforce a monition against him for their payment.(a)[2]

COE v. HUME AND THOMPSON. Prerogative Court, Hil. Term, 4th Session, 1833.—The Court rejected with costs a petition praying that a bond-creditor in a large amount should be joined or substituted in an administration decreed to a simple contract creditor—the deceased's confidential solicitor—who had entered into articles with sureties to pay the debts rateably, and who was approved, as such

(a)[1] Davies, in reply to the petition, stated that the will remained in his custody, sealed up, till 1824, when he heard by chance of Jones's death; that he (Davies) was at such time a journeyman carpenter at Deptford, and upon opening the packet he took the will out, and delivered it to his brother-in-law, with whom it remained till 1826, when, not being able to find out the subscribing witnesses, he delivered it to Capper, who stated that he would procure evidence to prove the genuineness of the signature. In Davies's subsequent allegation it was pleaded that Davies, in going from Welchpool to Shrewsbury on the 12th of September, 1816, met Jones; that in riding together they discovered that they were relations; that on arriving at Shrewsbury the deceased was taken ill at an inn, and on the evening of that day he made this will: that of the subscribed witnesses, one died in August, 1828, and another could not be found. Upon the evidence it appeared that the third witness was the ostler at the inn. A sister of the deceased, with whom he was on terms of friendly intercourse, was living at the date of this will.

(a)[2] See Le Mann v. Bonsall, 1 Add. 399; Wagner v. Mears, 2 Hagg. Ecc. 531.

representative, by the executors (who had renounced) and also by the bond-creditor.—The Court never forces a joint administration.

On petition.

Charles Ogilvie, late of the Custom House, died on the 14th of August, 1832. His executors having renounced, and the residuary legatee, who was resident in India, having been duly cited, letters of administration were decreed on the 22d of November to James Coe, who, as partner in the firm of Coe and Tippetts, solicitors, in London, was a simple contract creditor for 450l. On the 28th of November Mr. Hume, a creditor, prayed a joint administration: he afterwards waived his petition; and on the 12th of December the administration was directed to issue to Mr. Coe. On the 14th of December Mr. Coe gave in justifying security, and entered into a bond to pay the debts rateably. The administration, however, had not issued, when, on the 21st of Decem-[399]-ber, Mr. Thompson, a bond-creditor in 1000l., applied to be joined in the administration; or that it should be granted solely to him. An act on petition was accordingly entered into by Thompson.

On behalf of Coe it was alleged that Thompson was a solicitor, resident in Liverpool; that the deceased's effects were in London; and that of 1380l., in his late bankers' hands, an injunction as to 1078l. had been obtained by Mr. Hume; that in 1829 a bill was filed by certain subscribers to the Customs' annuity fund against the deceased; that Coe and his partner were, in respect of such suit (which it was necessary to revive), entrusted by him with numerous papers and accounts, and Mr. Coe had, with the approval of the executors, and knowledge and concurrence of Thompson, agreed to become the deceased's personal representative.

The knowledge and concurrence of Mr. Thompson, as set forth, were admitted; but it was alleged on his behalf that he was the principal creditor, and the party first, and to the greatest extent, interested in the deceased's estate; and that until December he was not aware of the proposed litigation by Coe (administrator) in consequence of the bill in Chancery by Hume; that upon hearing this he (Thompson) became alarmed, and considered that as bond-creditor he was entitled to have some controul in the conduct of the suit.

Addams for Mr. Thompson. As the testator only died in August, 1832, there has been no lapse of time to affect Mr. Thompson's claim. The prayer for a grant of joint administration being opposed, the Court, in [400] conformity with established practice, will not force it: but Mr. Thompson, being a bond-creditor, is preferably entitled to the administration; and in this case the declaration of the effects shews that there is no probability that any other creditor will be paid.

Lushington contrà. The lapse of time is not immaterial; because, in reference to the assets, Mr. Thompson's interest is of such magnitude that he had every inducement (and he had also ample opportunity) to investigate the whole of the testator's affairs. Yet how did Mr. Thompson act? He approved of the administration being entrusted to Mr. Coe. This very approval and concurrence, independently of other facts, establish that Mr. Coe is a fit and desirable person to represent the testator, and to administer the estate. The principle on which grants of administration to creditors proceed is that of insuring equal justice to all the creditors in their several degrees, according to priority: but the argument on the other side tends to shew this, that Mr. Thompson, if he is administrator, will take his 1000l. and leave the other creditors to get what they can. The administration should be granted, so that the estate may prove as beneficial and productive as it can be made.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. Charles Ogilvie died on the 14th of August, 1832: he left a will and two codicils; the executors renounced probate, and the residuary legatee, having been cited at the instance of Mr. Coe (a creditor in 450l.) to take the ad-[401]-ministration, has given no appearance; he is, it is stated, resident in India. An appearance, however, was given for Mr. Hume (also a creditor), who applied to be joined with Coe in the administration: this was objected to; but the petition in support of the application being soon waived, administration, with the will and codicils annexed, was directed to pass the seal to Mr. Coe, who was assigned to enter into articles to pay rateably—thus not to take advantage of his situation as administrator; and he was also assigned to give security to observe that restriction. On the 14th of December the articles were executed, and the bond entered into; when on the 21st of that month an appearance was given for Mr. Thompson, an attorney at Liverpool, as a bond-creditor in 1000l., praying a joint or sole administration.

Now it is truly stated, and admitted, that the Court never forces a joint administration: here the administration has already been granted to Mr. Coe, and he has complied with all the steps preparatory to his taking it. There must in every case be very strong grounds to induce the Court to rescind its decree; but in this case there is this additional fact to be overcome, that the administration has been granted to Coe, with the knowledge and concurrence of Thompson. This opposition, then, comes at a late period and not under favourable circumstances. It appears too, that the proceedings in Chancery, instituted against the testator in his lifetime, must necessarily be continued, and Mr. Coe was this gentleman's confidential solicitor for ten years, and is in possession of all his documents: the whole of the deceased's property is also in London: all the previous circumstances, therefore, tend to induce the Court to confirm the [402] administration. Thompson, as I have already stated, is a solicitor at Liverpool; but it is alleged, as the ground of his application, that he is the principal creditor, and on that account wishes to have a voice and control in the Chancery suit; but I am not aware that, either as joint or sole administrator, a solicitor resident at Liverpool would be more likely or more competent to conduct the proceedings in Chancery properly than the solicitor in London who has hitherto carried them on, and is already acquainted with the cause. Considering, then, this late application by Mr. Thompson after his consent, and there being no suggestion that Mr. Coe is an improper person to have the administration, nor that he does not take all the care of the estate, and that the administration of this insolvent estate has been stopped for nearly two months, I reject this petition, and decree that the costs of it be paid by Mr. Thompson.

Petition rejected with costs.

FULLERTON v. DIXON. Prerogative Court, Hil. Term, By-Day, 1833.—The proctor of an executor, cited to take probate, having alleged that he is ready so to do, the Court is bound to decree probate; nor is the proctor, though assigned, compellable to exhibit a proxy, as the act of taking probate would confirm the proctor's allegation.

Jacob Dixon, sole surviving partner of the Dumbarton Glass-work Company, died at Dumbarton on the 26th of September, 1831, having made and duly executed his will and codicils, or trust deeds and dispositions, according to the form of the law of Scotland: he named his three sons, Jacob, Anthony, and Joseph, and H. W. Campbell and A. Graham, Esq., executors or trustees, and residuary legatees in trust, and appointed his son, Jacob Dixon the younger, the beneficial re-[403]-siduary legatee. Anthony and Joseph alone of the five executors took upon themselves the administration of the estate: Jacob, the eldest son, died intestate in the life-time of his father, leaving a widow and four minors, viz. two sons and two daughters, who were entitled, by the law and practice of Scotland, to the residue of the estate of their grandfather, viz. Jacob Dixon the elder (Anstruther v. Chalmers, 2 Simons, 1).

By his death a suit in the Court of Session, brought against him by the representatives of some former partners in the glass-works, abated; and the Court of Session appointed (after opposition by Anthony and Joseph Dixon) Mr. Allan Fullerton manager or judicial factor of the estate and effects of the glass company, with power to take the same under his charge, and to manage and wind up the whole affairs of the company. This order was affirmed by the House of Lords in 1832. At the death of Jacob Dixon the elder the said company was possessed of divers goods, chattels, and credits in the hands of English agents, who refused to pay Mr. Fullerton, for want of a personal representative of Jacob Dixon the elder, under the authority of the Prerogative Court. In consequence of this, Mr. Fullerton cited the four surviving executors of the will and codicils of Jacob Dixon the elder, and the parties entitled as residuary legatees, "to accept or refuse probate of the same, or to take administration with the same annexed; or to shew cause why administration (with the same annexed) should not be granted to him, Fullerton, the judicial factor, limited as to all the right, title, and in-[404]-terest of Jacob Dixon the elder, as surviving partner of the Dumbarton Glass-work Company, on his giving sufficient security." An appearance on the first session of Hilary Term, 1833, was given for Joseph Dixon, one of the executors cited, and he prayed probate. This was opposed by Fullerton's proctor, who prayed to be heard on his petition, and he was accordingly assigned to deliver his act, in support thereof, on the second session, and the proctor for Dixon to exhibit, at the same time, a proxy. On the second session, on the part of Fullerton, a proxy of the widow of Jacob Dixon the younger, as guardian elected of her four children, was exhibited, consenting to the grant of limited administration to Fullerton: and on the by-day no proxy having been exhibited by Dixon, the administration limited according to the tenor of the decree was prayed to be granted to Fullerton.

The King's advocate for Mr. Fullerton.

Lushington contrà, for Joseph Dixon.

Per Curiam. A decree has been served upon several executors, citing them to take probate. A proctor states that one of the parties cited is willing to accept probate. What need then is there of any proxy authorizing the proctor to allege this? It would be a singular thing for the Court to require such a proxy. The act of taking probate will be the best confirmation of the proctor's allegation. I am bound to grant probate to the executor, who is desirous of taking it; and I accordingly decree it.

[405] SPRATT v. HARRIS. Prerogative Court, Hil. Term, By-Day, 1833.—A. resident but not domiciled in France, makes a testamentary paper relating to personalty in France, and to personalty and realty in England; and a second paper solely relating to personalty in France, and disposing of the whole of it to a woman with whom he cohabited, but appoints no executor in either paper, nor residuary legatee, nor devisee of his property in England—his widow is entitled to administration with both papers annexed.

Alexander Hanna Spratt died at Soissons, in France, on the 20th of April, 1832: he left a widow and six children resident in England, and possessed at his death real estates in Kent. The present question arose on the petition of the widow to take administration with two testamentary scripts annexed.

Script A, after directing 1000l. to be laid out in an annuity for Sarah Harris, and a further sum of 1000l. to be invested for the benefit of his (the deceased's) then only child by Harris, went on: "I also give to Sarah Harris, my horse, chaise, and all such trifling effects of a personal nature as may be in her possession at Soissons. All my other real and personal property to be disposed of as the law commands. Done at Soissons, this 17th of January, 1825." This paper was in the deceased's handwriting; it was signed, and attested by three witnesses.

B disposed as follows:—"I give and bequeath to Sarah Harris, all the effects, moveable and immoveable, which I possess in France; all the sums and all the bonds which I have acquired, and which I possess upon Haiti, with the arrears due and to grow due, to Sarah Harris, residing with me; and these bonds are deposited with Mr. Holtinger, my banker, at Paris." The original instrument, in the French language, drawn up at Soissons, on the 20th of April, 1832, by a notary, and in the presence of four witnesses, was registered at Soissons.

It was alleged, on the part of Harris, "that [406] she was the universal legatee in such last paper, which was never meant by the testator to be taken in conjunction with his former will, as together containing a will of which probate was to be granted in this country, but that the same is and was meant by the testator to be a separate will limited to his property in France, and where the testator, at the time of making the same, if not domiciled, was resident, and ought and was meant by the testator to be dealt with, in respect of probate and otherwise, agreeably to the laws of France; and that as such will disposed of property wholly without the province of Canterbury, it was not within the jurisdiction of the Court to decree probate or administration thereof; wherefore she prayed that the administration to Mrs. Spratt might be limited to the will of 1825.

For the widow, it was alleged that the deceased's personal property, wheresoever situate at the time of his death, was liable to the payment of the mortgage debts on his real estate in this country; and that there was not sufficient personal property of the deceased's out of France to pay his mortgage and simple contract debts here: that the deceased was a British born subject and domiciled in this country; and that this Court had jurisdiction to determine the validity of all the deceased's testamentary papers relating to his personal estate, to grant administration in respect of the same, and that all such personal estate wheresoever situate must be administered according to the laws of this country; and that there being no executor in either paper, the widow was entitled to administration with A and B annexed.

[407] Per Curiam. Will the deceased's property in France be liable for his debts in England?

Addams for Miss Harris. I conceive that it will: but still as to how paper B itself is to be dealt with depends on foreign law; it is a foreign will over which this Court has no jurisdiction. I do not contend that the testator was domiciled in France.

The King's advocate for the widow. The latter paper must be considered a necessary part of the former; it will operate on the property that the widow and children are to take. If the disposition under the two papers had been quite separate and independent, and there had been two distinct executors, there would be some ground for a separate probate; but here there is no executor named, and the widow is entitled to administer, with the two instruments annexed.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. The testator died on the 20th of April, 1832, at Soissons; he left a widow and six lawful children, and freehold estates in the county of Kent. In 1824 Mr. Spratt formed a connexion with Sarah Harris, by whom he had three children: he was accustomed, it seems, to travel over different parts of Europe—in the winter because England was too cold, and in the summer for his amusement. When abroad, he cohabited with Harris, who with her children occupied lodgings at Soissons, or travelled with him; but in the spring and autumn he resided with his wife and family at Canterbury. In 1825 he executed at Soissons a will, in which [408] he provided for Harris and the child he then had by her; and directed "all his other real and personal property to be disposed of as the law commands." Of this paper he did not appoint an executor nor residuary legatee. On the 20th of April, 1832, the deceased had a testamentary disposition drawn up for him, in a notarial form, at Soissons; of this paper the only disposing part is to this effect: "I bequeath to Sarah Harris all the effects, moveable and immoveable, which I possess in France; all the sums and bonds which I have acquired, and which I possess upon Haiti, and which are deposited with my banker, Mr. Holtinger, at Paris." So far this is a disposition in favour of Harris of all the deceased's property in France; he however does not appoint an executor of this paper; if he had so done, such executor would have been entitled to probate.

At first the widow opposed paper A, but that opposition was withdrawn, and the question now is, how the administration should be granted. That the widow is entitled to administration with paper A annexed is not denied, but she applies for it with A and B: this application is objected to, inasmuch as B, the instrument drawn up in April, 1832, only relates to property in France. I apprehend that all personal property follows the person, and that the rights of a person constituted in England representative of a party deceased, domiciled in England, are not limited to the personal property in England, but extend to such property wherever locally situate. True it is a testator may appoint different persons for the representation and distribution of his property in different places; that would be the act and appointment of the party [409] himself, and not of the law; (a) but here there is no executor either in one paper or in the other.

There can be no doubt that the property in France, referred to in the instrument B, is part of the property of which the testator died possessed; and there also can be no doubt that creditors have a demand upon all personal property, even against a disposition by will. Mr. Spratt, therefore, by a bequest of all his property in France to a legatee, can only give it away subject to his debts: he cannot, by this instrument, defeat the just claims of his creditors; here are debts and mortgages to be discharged, and it is sworn that the personalty in England is not even sufficient to pay the debts; and, according to the law of this country, personalty is in some cases further chargeable in exoneration of mortgages (2 Williams on Executors, p. 1042, et seq.). This may be a hardship on the woman Harris, and a much greater hardship on the innocent children, but it is the law, and the Court cannot alter it. The property, then, in France being subject to such liability, what inconvenience or injury can accrue to the legatee, if the widow takes administration with B annexed. If the administration does not legally extend to the deceased's property in France, Harris will have her remedy in that country; and if there are no debts in England to which this portion of his property is liable, the administratrix will, in that respect, be considered a trustee. But I cannot do otherwise than grant administration, with the two papers annexed, to the widow.

(a) Wentworth says: "The making of an executor may be partial or dividedly, and not entirely." Office of an Executor, p. 22-9, 14th ed.

Costs out of estate refused.

[410] BLEWITT v. BLEWITT. Prerogative Court, March 2nd, 1833.—The strong presumption of law is always adverse to an unfinished instrument materially altering and controlling a will deliberately framed, regularly executed, recently approved, and supported by previous and uniform dispositive acts; and this presumption is stronger in proportion to the less perfect state of, and the small progress made in, such instrument. To establish such a paper there must be the fullest proof of capacity, volition, final intention, and interruption by the act of God. Paper pronounced against.

[Referred to, Whyte v. Pollock, 1882, 7 A. C. 413.]

This cause respected a paper propounded as a codicil; it was a rough draft, not signed, and was dated this day of February, 1832. On the one hand it was contended that the testator was capable, and had fully and finally approved of the paper; on the other hand, that there was a want of capacity adequate to the act; or (supposing a sufficient capacity), yet that there was no free-agency, nor fixed and final intention.

Lushington and Addams for the paper.

The King's advocate and Nicholl contrà.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. The property depending in this case is of considerable magnitude, and although the evidence is not so voluminous as sometimes has occurred in this Court, yet the circumstances, necessary to be carefully examined and weighed, are many and important. Already twelve hours have been occupied in hearing the argument; and from the ample and full justice which has been done to each client, the Court has no reason to consider the time unnecessarily spent: however, I think it necessary for the satisfaction of the parties that I should state rather more in detail than in some cases of greater bulk the evidence on which the judgment of the Court is founded.

The deceased, Edward Blewitt, died on the 8th of May, 1832, at the age of sixty-nine; he left a widow, Rachel Blewitt, two sons and a daughter [411] by a former wife; a grand-daughter—the child of a younger son who was dead; an elder son, Edward, a lunatic; his second son, Reginald, one of the parties in this cause; and a daughter, Frances. By his second wife, the present widow, he had six children, all born before marriage; some are grown up, one is of age. The first wife died in 1808: about 1810 his first child by Rachel Rogers was born; and in September, 1830, he contracted his second marriage.

The property of the deceased consisted of a real estate, viz., Llanturnam Abbey, in Monmouthshire, estimated at 1500l. per annum, certain personal property, about 8000l., over which he had a power of appointment, and other personal property stated to be under 43,000l.; but the exact amount is not shewn. It appears that his real estate was entailed, by settlement before his first marriage, upon the male issue of that marriage.

The deceased executed several wills. Before the Court there is one will in the year 1814, that is cancelled; one in 1821; another in 1824, with a codicil to it in 1826; again a will in 1827; another in 1828; and a codicil in January, 1830. Most of these instruments appear to be in the hand-writing of the deceased, and are regularly drawn up and executed. The codicil of 1830 is in his hand-writing, but the writing is more defective and less clear than in the former papers. On the 12th of October, 1830, he executed his last will. In all these wills he had made a provision, which he increased from time to time, for Rachel Rogers and her children, and his last will is dated one month after he had married Rogers and that she had [412] become Mrs. Blewitt. This will is not opposed; it gives the property, over which the deceased had a power of appointment, among his children by the first marriage; it gives his widow 600l. a year for life, with benefit of survivorship to the six children, each of which is to have an annuity of 100l. with benefit of survivorship, and to each of the four sons there is a power given to the trustees of advancing 400l. for the purpose of setting them up in life; and the residue of the personal property is given as follows:—"To my son Edmund Blewitt, and in case of his death to my son Reginald James Blewitt, and in case of his death to my daughter Frances Mary Ann Blewitt." This will was regularly executed, and it is attested by two witnesses, Mr. Gilbert and Mr. Dobinson, clerks to Messrs. Bicknell, Roberts, and Co., Lincoln's Inn. By the will of 1828 Rachel Rogers was to have only 200l. a year, but in the codicil of January, 1830, this sum is raised to 600l. a year, the deceased commencing the codicil in these terms: "Having taken into consideration the helpless state of my family, I do agree to allow Rachel Rogers, of Caerleon, Monmouthshire, 400l. a year in addition to every former bequest." Hence it appears that the principle of the disposition in the will of October, 1830, was not a hasty but a deliberate and uniform principle.

It is not immaterial that, in every one of the deceased's wills, the residue is given to his lawful children: in several his son Reginald is omitted; in the last will he is postponed to Edmund, which is not extraordinary, nor a mark of existing resentment; for as the eldest son was a lunatic, Reginald [413] would succeed to the real property at Llanturnam, and he is not excluded in any of the wills from an equal share of the property over which the deceased had a power of appointment, except in the will of 1821, in which he has only 200l. a year, this will being made at the time he was offended with his son Reginald, on account of his marriage. This son assisted in the preparation, if he were not the writer, of the will of October, 1830; he accompanied the deceased to the solicitor's office upon the occasion of its execution, and was present at that ceremony. Of this will, Mrs. Blewitt, the widow, Mr. Wightwick Roberts, and the deceased's son Edmund, are executors. In the month following the execution of this will the testator had a violent attack of paralysis, which deprived him of the use of his right side, of speech, and, no doubt, affected his faculties in a considerable degree; for the attack is described by both the medical attendants, not as spinal, but as an affection of the head. He recovered in some measure the use of his right leg, but not of his arm, for he was obliged to learn to make a signature with his left hand; and his recovery of speech scarcely amounted to more than monosyllables—with great exertion he could articulate short sentences.

Here, then, are three material dates—the marriage of the testator in September—his will in October—and the attack of paralysis in November, 1830.

It is alleged that in February, 1832, the deceased made a codicil, which has been propounded in this cause by the eldest natural daughter, Ann Rogers Blewitt, as one of the residuary legatees: and it is material to look at the form and [414] contents of this instrument.(a) In point of form, it is in a very incipient state; it is written on (a) The codicil purported to revoke a bequest of the residue to the testator's legitimate children, and to give it in trust "unto and between his children by his wife, Rachel Blewitt." At the commencement of the suit Mr. Reginald Blewitt denied the interest of Ann Rogers Blewitt in this codicil, inasmuch as neither she, nor her brothers, nor sister, nor either of them, was or were christened, acknowledged, or known as the child or children of Edward Blewitt (the deceased), by Rachel Blewitt, his wife, and therefore it was submitted "that, even were the validity of the pretended codicil established in this Court, yet that Ann Rogers Blewitt was not, within the legal intent and meaning of the said codicil, one of the children of the said deceased by his said wife Rachel Blewitt, and was, consequently, not one of the persons designated as residuary legatees therein."

The widow alleged that, as executrix in the codicil, she would take probate of it, if pronounced for.

This question, as to the interest, was, upon the facts stated on both sides in an act on petition, debated on behalf of Ann Rogers Blewitt by Lushington and Addams; and on behalf of Mr. Reginald Blewitt by the King's advocate and Nicholl. (See cases on the point collected in 1 Roper on Legacies (ed. by White), vol. 1, c. 2, s. 2. Also Harris v. Lloyd, 1 Turn. & Russ. 310. Bagley v. Mollard, 1 Russ. & Mylne, 581.)

Per Curiam. The only question at present is whether the natural children have such a primâ facie interest in the residue bequeathed by this codicil as to entitle them, or either of them, to propound it. If the codicil be valid, it is impossible to doubt of the testator's intention: not all the refinements of argument, nor strictness of construction, could ever raise any doubt as to the persons intended: children may not generally mean illegitimate children, but illegitimate children were clearly here designated: a Court of Probate only in such a case considers whether there be an apparent interest. The question of construction does not properly belong to this [415] three sheets of draft paper, which seem to have been previously used; and it is in the handwriting of Mr. Binns, who is himself a legatee—but in blank. There are erasures, interlineations, and some important alterations in the body of the instrument—a legacy or annuity to the granddaughter is struck out, which, it would seem, formed part of the original instructions: the effect of this would be to increase the residue. But the alterations, as affecting the executed will, are still more important, for this codicil proposes to appoint Mr. Binns—the drawer—guardian of the children, jointly with the widow, and also executor, instead of Mr. Wightwick Roberts; and in the disposition of the residue all the legitimate children, not merely Reginald, but the deceased's daughter Frances, and the issue of his son Edmund, who died in July, 1831, are struck out, and the illegitimate children substituted. This is a most alarming and important alteration.

Looking, then, at its form and contents, every possible legal presumption is against such an inchoate paper, arising, first, from its unfinished state, next from the condition of the deceased, and, lastly, from the great alteration in this most important disposition of the residue; a disposition to which he had so firmly adhered, in favour of the legitimate offspring, in all his former wills. To establish such a paper would require evidence—clear beyond all question—of full capacity in the testator; of ability to estimate and compre-[416]-hend the nature and effect of the transaction, of his perfect free agency—that the act was without fraud and circumvention being practised upon him; and, lastly, of fixed and final intention, and that the deceased was prevented, by an interposition of the act of God, from proceeding to complete the instrument It thus becomes necessary to enter briefly into the history of the two branches of the deceased's family.

Before the death of his first wife, in 1808—about eight months—Rachel Rogers, of the town of Caerleon, not far from Llanturnam, was hired as housemaid, the family then residing at Llanturnam Abbey; she may shortly afterwards have become his wife's own attendant, and have so continued to the time of her death: she remained in Mr. Blewitt's service till 1810, and then returned to Caerleon. Some suspicions were entertained of an illicit intercourse between Rachel Rogers and her master; but of that intercourse there was no child born at Llanturnam. The connexion, however, was clandestinely carried on for several years, for there was never any public cohabitation, nor any introduction of her and her children to his friends; and in all his wills the deceased describes himself of Llanturnam Abbey, and Rachel Rogers of Caerleon; although latterly they resided together at different places in and about London—still with some concealment; for his intimate friends were unacquainted with this connexion, and the children; for they did not make their appearance when his friends visited him. Even his brother-in-law, Mr. Osborne, first heard of Rachel Rogers when the deceased was living at Sunbury, and she was then only just alluded to by the deceased; and he saw her for the first time in January, 1832, six-[417]-teen months after she and the deceased had been privately married.

The deceased, after the paralytic stroke in November, 1830, was uniformly in the hands of this person and her children; they could prevent any person from having access to him: they had the management of his house and expenditure. However, from his enfeebled state of mind, and being, as I have mentioned, unable to write, except with his left hand, it was agreed between the widow and the son Edmund, who was living in London, that his drafts on his bankers should not be paid without being countersigned by his medical attendant; and that drafts should only be drawn for necessary house expences: this was a very proper limitation, for at his bankers

---

Court. If even the intention of a testator were doubtful, and the construction of the instrument also doubtful, yet this Court would always allow a party claiming under it to attempt to establish its validity. To bar such a party, the authorities against the interest must be so clear as to admit of no doubt; and I cannot say, looking to the whole of this paper, that such is the case here. I am not satisfied why the widow, as executrix, has not propounded this paper; but were she now to propound it, the cause might be burthened with a presumption that the residuary legatees were, in this Court, supposed to have no interest. Anxiously, therefore, guarding against a prejudice to either party elsewhere, I overrule the petition denying the interest, and assign Mr. R. Blewitt's proctor to declare whether he will oppose the paper propounded.

there was, at his death, a balance of about 6000l. Such being the understanding, it was not necessary rigidly to examine every draft; and the deceased himself was sufficiently intelligent to take alarm, and withhold his signature, if any large sum had been attempted to be drawn. But before I examine the precise extent of his capacity, I will advert to the history of the other part—namely, the legitimate branch of his family.

The eldest son, Edward, was, as I have stated, an unfortunate lunatic: the second, Reginald, was bred to the law; he was articled to Stevenson and Co., and in 1822 became a partner in the house, the firm being "Bicknell, Roberts, and Blewitt," successors of Messrs. Stevenson: this partnership was dissolved in 1827. Reginald, aware that his marriage was disapproved of by his father, and had offended him, went abroad in 1827, and he there formed an improper connexion with another woman; this, with quitting his partnership, [418] and his going abroad perhaps, still more offended the deceased. The son became distressed, wrote to his father expressing deep contrition, promised he would submit entirely to his wishes, was forgiven, returned to England, settled himself at Gloucester, and afterwards at Monmouth. Of this forgiveness of, and reconciliation with, his son Reginald there is satisfactory proof; he was, in 1828, entrusted with receiving the rents, and with the management of his father's estates, an occupation which Edmund rather wished to give up.

In 1830 Reginald had a long illness; his father frequently called, and supplied him, while ill, liberally with money. But a better proof of full confidence is, that this son was privy to and assisted in making the will of October, 1830; he attended, as I have already said, at the solicitor's office at its execution, and on that occasion Gilbert, one of the attesting witnesses, deposes fully to the apparent cordiality between the deceased and his son Reginald. This transaction was only a few weeks before the paralytic attack, so that up to that time the reconciliation existed: yet the earlier offences to which I have adverted are laid as the foundation of the codicil by which Reginald is cut off from a share in the residue. It will be matter of inquiry whether he gave offence to his father after the paralytic attack.

The deceased's younger son, Edmund, seems to have been at the bar; he married a daughter of Mr. Prothero, a solicitor in Monmouthshire; and in July, 1831, died, leaving a widow with one only child—a daughter.

Frances, the remaining child, had been educated properly; but having no fit home to receive her, the deceased continued to board her at [419] school till she was twenty-one; she then resided in lodgings upon an allowance; and, finally, with her brother Reginald at Monmouth.

Up, then, to the paralytic seizure—six weeks after the execution of the will—the deceased was not alienated from his son Reginald; nor is it suggested that there was any offence given by the daughter, nor by Edmund, nor by his child: but, on the other hand, the deceased was in the custody of his wife and illegitimate children; and this codicil was obtained in the absence, and without the privity or knowledge of, the legitimate children, against whose interests a very material alteration is projected by it.

The first important point to be examined is the state of the deceased's capacity subsequent to the paralytic attack. The degree of capacity necessary to a testamentary act must depend partly upon the nature of the act to be done, and partly upon the other accompanying circumstances—that is a principle laid down by all Courts, and it is the principle of plain common sense and sound reason: and I can hardly conceive a case where the Court would require more clear proof of intelligence and firmness of mind than in the present. For notwithstanding the provision which the deceased had made for his illegitimate family just before his paralytic attack, notwithstanding in all former wills he had given the residue in favour of his legitimate children; yet by the codicil propounded a complete revolution of intention in this respect is set up. That circumstance is alarming, and demands a vigilant enquiry. Again, the nature of the deceased's paralytic seizure was not spinal—which sometimes does not materially affect the understanding—but it was an affection of the head, which tends [420] strongly to injure the mental faculties: this character of the deceased's disorder makes it the more necessary for the Court to trace the facts of the case step by step, and it will be the best mode of arriving at a just conclusion upon them.

I may observe at the outset of this enquiry that no foundation is laid, preliminarily, by the party setting up this codicil, either in respect of capacity or intention. There is no one matter of business even alleged to have been transacted by the deceased after his paralytic stroke; though he had large estates; though leases were to be attended to; though he had mineral property; though there was a large sum at his bankers, yet there is no proof that, after his seizure, he was even consulted on any one act of business in the management of his own concerns, except as to the mere signing of drafts for the current household expences. And in respect to any intention of altering his will of the 12th of October, 1830, there is not a single declaration—no wish ever expressed—nor suggestion thrown out, not even on the death of his son Edmund—that he was in any way dissatisfied with that will. There is nothing of the sort till after the 11th of February, 1832. To trace, then, the facts as they appear in evidence.

Immediately upon the attack in November, 1830, Dr. Arnott and Mr. Carrick attended the deceased. Dr. Arnott attended three times only; Mr. Carrick from the time he was called in till Mr. Blewitt's death: both these medical gentlemen distinguish paralysis as to its effects, and describe the deceased's attack to be of the sort I have mentioned, and that it affected his mental faculties. The deceased, I have said, kept a considerable sum at his bankers; he alone could [421] draw upon them for it; money was wanted for the ordinary expences of the house; and as he had lost the use of his right hand, and the signature with his left would be obviously very defective, it became necessary to make some arrangement in respect to the drafts, and consequently an order, dated on the 27th of March, 1831, was served upon Messrs. Coutts's, the banker's, that upon the drafts being countersigned by Mr. Carrick they should be paid. This arrangement took place with the concurrence of Mrs. Blewitt and of the deceased's son Edmund: nor is this arrangement interrupted by the death of Edmund in July, 1831—an event of which the deceased did not seem to take any notice.

Mr. Roberts, who informed him of this event, thus deposes on the 10th article of the son's allegation: "Edmund Blewitt died suddenly at Gloucester early in July, 1831. Reginald wrote to inform me of it, and to request that I would inform his father of it: the day I received his letter (5th July) I called at Major Blewitt's to apprize him of this event; I saw Mrs. Blewitt, and told her the object of my visit; but she replied that the major had not been so well for a day or two, and that it would disturb him to see me: she made some excuse to that effect, and I, remembering what I had heard Edmund Blewitt say, looked upon what she said as a mere excuse, and pressed to be allowed to see the major. I pressed it as far as I could without rudeness, but without effect, and left the house without seeing him. Her excuse was, not that my seeing him in particular would disturb him, but that he was in that irritable state that it would distress him to see any one; she also informed me [422] that they had heard by that morning's post of Edmund Blewitt's death, and that it had been communicated to the major; and, upon my inquiring how he received the intelligence, she said that he had not taken any notice of it up to that time (two o'clock in the afternoon), and Mrs. Blewitt said she had received the letter some hours before."

Then, on this occasion, Mr. Roberts, an executor in the will, was not allowed to see the deceased, on the plea—not that he was overcome with grief—but that he was in an irritable state, and that the visit would disturb him; and that when told of his son's death he had taken no notice of it, though, in the argument, Edmund was described as his favorite son. The probability of this statement is confirmed by Mr. Prothero, the father of Mrs. Edmund Blewitt. This gentleman had come to town upon the occasion to confer with the deceased, and to see what provision he had made in his will for the infant child. Upon the eighth article he thus deposes: "Being told by the servant that I could not see him, I asked to see Mrs. Blewitt" (and no person seems to have had an opportunity of seeing the deceased without Mrs. Blewitt's permission); "her I saw; and I stated to her that, understanding Major Blewitt had made a will appointing the property over which he had a power, I was anxious, on behalf of my grandchild, to know how the child stood in the will; and Mrs. Blewitt promised that if I would send the next day I should have an extract of it: but on the following day I received a letter from Anne Blewitt, written for her mother, stating that her mother could not send the extract, as she had not the will in her possession. [423] From the manner in which Mrs. Blewitt treated my application, without any reference to Major Blewitt, or at all considering whether it was his pleasure or not that I should have what I asked for, I inferred that every thing was under her management." And he further says: "My understanding at the time, knowing that Major Blewitt had a paralytic seizure, was, that he was himself incompetent to the management of his affairs, and that they were under the control of Mrs. Blewitt. What I had to do with him was through Mrs. Blewitt, and in the course of the conversation I had with her she spoke herself constantly of the major's making another will, in which my grandchild would be taken care of as far as having the share of the settled property which Edmund Blewitt would have had. She spoke all this as if it proceeded from herself, and rested with herself: that was my impression at the time—that it rested entirely with Mrs. Blewitt what the major would do."

Here, again, is Mr. Prothero, who gains no access to the deceased, but his impression is, that the deceased was incompetent to see any one upon business, and that he was under the entire control of the wife: her conduct indeed strongly denotes custody, and confirms that impression.

In the month of August, 1831, Mr. Carrick went to Scotland; he was absent about three weeks, and during that period his partner countersigned a draft for 250l.; but of this draft, it not coming within the understood terms, payment was refused; however, upon Carrick's return, he countersigned it, and the draft was paid.

At the latter end of 1831 transactions of more [424] importance began to take place. Thomas, the eldest illegitimate son, returned from France; he wished a commission in the army; the deceased was asked to give a draft for the money; it was obtained: and Sir Edmund Antrobus, of the house of Coutts and Co., in his evidence on the 12th article, thus deposes in respect to it: "On one occasion a young man, who, I think, represented himself as the son of Mrs. Blewitt, was introduced into the office in which Sir Coutts Trotter was, as well as myself, and I think he was the bearer of a larger draft than usual, and that it was not countersigned by Mr. Carrick; we demurred to the payment of it; and I think the young man stated it was for the purchase of a commission for himself." But this matter is more fully developed in the evidence of Mr. Carrick, on the 13th article: "I remember that Mr. Thomas Blewitt returned from abroad towards the end of December, 1831, and that the major, at several visits I paid him, was in a great degree of excitement; but whether that arose from Mrs. Blewitt's urging him to sign a draft for the purchase of a commission in the army, and his refusing to do so, I cannot say. It was at the same time that he was so much excited that I learnt from Mrs. Blewitt that he had promised to purchase this commission, and that he then refused, but that she urged him to do it." This excitement, the witness says, was on the 20th and 21st of December, and on the latter day he says "the deceased tried to make him understand that he wanted to remove to the Tavistock Hotel, where he had formerly been, and that he drew his fingers backwards and forwards across his throat, so that he was induced to believe that the deceased had an [425] intention of cutting his throat, and he cautioned Mrs. Blewitt not to allow him to be left alone." He further says: "When the deceased drew his fingers across his throat, it just floated in my mind, as he did this in the presence of his family, he might mean he was in danger from them and fearful of having his throat cut: but both upon this occasion and on the preceding day I considered that he was wandering, that there was an aberration of mind, and that his desire to go to the Tavistock and the signs he made of drawing his fingers across his throat were the effect of mental delusion."

Such was Mr. Carrick's impression: he appears to give his evidence in a fair way; and Dr. Macmichael admits that he is a man of much respectability.

Here, then, is this poor paralytic man, irritable from the very nature of his disorder, requested to grant money, which he refused, and for days is excited nearly to madness, till he is compelled to submit. Whether, when the deceased drew his finger across his throat, it was to denote a fear for his own life, or that, sooner than consent to such demands, he would (or that he might as well) cut his own throat, Mr. Carrick was unable to ascertain; he could not interpret the deceased's feelings at the time, and the deceased was not able very fully to explain himself: but whatever was meant, it shewed in the deceased an excited state of mind, and that he wished to leave his own house.

The circumstances, therefore, connected with this draft throw a strong suspicion upon all the transactions of Mrs. Blewitt and her children, [426] relating to the deceased's property, and the means used to obtain it.

As soon as Mr. Carrick was acquainted with this business he refused to countersign any more drafts; and on the 5th of January, 1832, he gives notice of this intention to Messrs. Coutts: it was not necessary that he should go to them immediately, as he was aware that no draft would be paid without his signature.

The funds for the house expences being thus suspended, it became a matter of urgent consideration among the deceased's friends how this embarrassment might be removed, and some arrangement made for present exigencies: accordingly, Mr. Roberts, the executor, and Mr. Osborne, the friend and brother-in-law of the deceased, go to him, and in a few days an arrangement is effected to obviate the difficulty. Mr. Roberts' account of this interview is, on the 14th article, as follows:—"I knew it was Mr. Reginald Blewitt's wish that there should be no unnecessary inconvenience experienced, and knowing that I was an executor of the major's will, I considered myself acting for him, and to remove any inconvenience he might be put to for want of necessary funds. On the 8th of January I and Mr. Osborne saw him at his house at Kensington; he was in the drawing room—sitting in an easy chair, in a paralytic state, very feeble, and with a vacant countenance: there was rather a wildness in his eye at first, but no expression of intelligence. Mr. Osborne shook hands with the major, who seemed to recognise him: whether he recollected me or not I cannot say. There was no kind of salutation to either of us. Mrs. Blewitt introduced us into the room. I, address-[427]-ing myself rather to her than to the major, but so loud that he heard what I said, informed them that Mr. Carrick had objected to countersign his drafts any longer, and therefore that Messrs. Coutts would not honour any more of his drafts; and I expressed my readiness at the time to attend to any suggestion of theirs to remove the inconvenience. Mrs. Blewitt briefly and rapidly repeated to Major Blewitt part of what I had said in this way—'Mr. Carrick won't sign your cheques, and Coutts won't pay them.' The answer the major made I could not construe; he turned towards Mrs. Blewitt and muttered something I could not make out; but Mrs. Blewitt interpreted what he said, 'Glad to see you, Mr. Osborne,' and upon her saying that, I thought there was something like Osborne in what he muttered." But there was no reference to the important subject they had come about. Mr. Roberts further says: "Major Blewitt took no notice whatever of my communication; he evinced no anger, no surprise; he made no observation nor suggestion; he was perfectly passive; nor did Mrs. Blewitt make any remark at the manner in which he received the communication; but she said, 'Reginald must be sent for;' and then she puts the question to him—'You will have no objection to see Reginald?' This was her own suggestion, and shews that at this time there was no dissatisfaction nor quarrel on the part of the deceased with his son Reginald: he muttered something to this, which she interpreted to mean 'None,'—that he had no objection to see him. What made her put the question I cannot tell; nothing had occurred to shew that there could be any difficulty in Major Blewitt's seeing his son: he had expressed no anger or [428] displeasure against him; Mr. Reginald's name had not even been mentioned: Mrs. Blewitt said she should write to him, or that he should be written to." Mr. Osborne gives the same description of the situation of the deceased at this interview, and confirms the truth of Roberts' statement.

This was the state of things on the 8th of January; and on Monday, the 9th, Mrs. Blewitt employs her daughter Anne to write to Reginald Blewitt what is certainly a very untrue representation of facts. The letter is in these terms:—

"26, Phillimore Place,
"Monday Morning.

"Dear Reginald,—I am desired to inform you that your uncle Osborne and Mr. Roberts called upon mamma yesterday, in consequence of hearing from Coutts and Co, that no more cheques would be paid, as Mr. Carrick thought papa not so well as he had been; and hope we shall hear from, or see you, as soon as possible, as something ought to be immediately done. There are several debts which must be discharged; such as school-books, housekeeping, Edward's board and annuities to Miss Macnamara, Mrs. Reece, &c. We consider papa quite in the same state; but papa not liking to take Mr. Carrick's medicines, it has made the Apothecary rather vicious, as he went to Coutts and made all this mischief. We hope you and Fanny are quite well, to whom we beg to present our kind love.—I remain, dear Reginald, your affectionate sister, "ANNE BLEWITT."

This letter is smooth and pleasant towards Mr. Reginald Blewitt; but it contains a gross misre-[429]-presentation in stating that Mr. Carrick had refused to sign the drafts as usual, because the deceased had refused to take his medicines. Such is the statement in this letter written by Miss Anne Blewitt under the directions of her mother; while it is clear that the cause of Carrick's refusal arose from the deceased's excitement or delusion of mind.

Reginald was from home when this letter arrived, and before his return he had received from Mr. Roberts the real account of the deceased's condition, and of Mr. Carrick's reasons. It was not extraordinary, then, that he should have written a strong answer to Anne. This letter is dated "Monmouth, January 21, 1832," and is in these terms:—

"Dear Anne,—I have been absent for some days in a distant part of the country on business, and did not receive your letter till yesterday. In it you state that Mr. Carrick's refusal to countersign cheques arose upon my father's refusal to take his medicines. Mr. Carrick tells a far different story. I understand, from the statement made by him to Mr. Roberts, that some of you have been greatly pressing my father to give a cheque for purchasing a commission for Tom; that my father expressed to Mr. C. a desire of going to the Tavistock, which he would not hear of, whereupon my father drew his finger across his throat; in consequence of which Mr. C. desired all dangerous weapons might be kept out of my father's way; that the subject of going to the Tavistock being renewed, my father again drew his finger as before; Mr. C. then said—'Surely the major does not mean that he is in dan-[430]-ger here?'—and my father intimated that he did mean it. I also understand that not long since my father was taken with a very alarming fainting fit, not one word of which you have mentioned to me. What object you could have in pressing my father to give a cheque for a commission, which you all know Tom cannot get at present, I am unwilling to guess at; but it is perfectly horrible to think that you have so used a poor helpless parent as to make him wish to change his home, and to imagine his life in danger from your unnatural conduct towards him. I have often seen you treat him with more insult and disrespect than I could well brook to witness, but never did I think it would come to this. I should have thought that the generous provision he has made for you all would have impressed you with some little gratitude towards your afflicted parent. I should also have supposed that, after having made a will by which, but for Edmund's unexpected death, I should have been totally disinherited of any part of my father's property, I was entitled to some share of your consideration. I am sorry, however, to find that all I have done for you is being paid with ingratitude and hypocrisy. You ask me to come to London: recollect the last occasion when my father, at some of your instigation, refused to allow me my expenses, although incurred for the sake of a dead brother and his orphan child, and which I have been obliged to pay out of my own small income. If I hear of any further acts on your parts, to wrong my father, I shall certainly take him under my own protection. I have written to my friend Roberts to know what Coutts and Co. will require in order to honour my [431] father's cheques, and when I hear from him I will do what is just and proper."

This letter is strongly expressed, and may be overcharged in some respects; but it is the natural letter of an affectionate son, and there is nothing in it except what the circumstances were likely enough to produce: as regarded his father, it evinced respect and attention, and anxiety for his comfort; as regarded Mrs. Blewitt and her daughter, it was not improbable that it should give them, as it really did, much offence: however, the letter was not long unanswered, and the young woman proves that she was not a very unequal match in her reply. On the 23d of January she thus writes:—

"Sir,—How dare you write such an insulting letter—accusing me, my mother, and my brother, of treating my father ill? Know that we are not so likely to do so as yourself. Mr. Carrick says he never wrote to you what you have stated in your letter, and has promised to write and contradict your wicked assertions." He did not say he heard from Mr. Carrick, but from Mr. Roberts. "We never have one penny but what is necessary, but we understand you have had 200l. from Mr. Prothero, without Papa's knowledge, besides never paying a farthing out of the estate to the bankers. God knows what you do with the money! Papa would never have spoken to you, or allowed you to come under his roof, had not my mother begged of him to forgive you, and to send you a hundred pounds, as you said you were starving at Paris. Look back to your own conduct; what folly and hypocrisy have you been guilty of! Long before Papa introduced me to [432] you he gave me to understand you were a liar, and other specimens of your conduct which I will not mention. We have you in our power more than you think for, and I will make you tremble when I see you. Recollect I have heard your conduct from a lady in France, which I am astonished at. We have asked Papa if he would like to live under your protection, and he says 'No;' and looks with horror at the idea: he has often and often said he hated you, and disliked the idea of your seeing him;"—notwithstanding the kindness which the deceased had shewed to him in 1830, and had intrusted to him the preparation of his will, and that he was present at the execution of it. "Indeed he was quite angry at the thought of sending for you." The account given by Roberts is quite the reverse. "Mamma says she shall consult physicians and Mr. Bings (Binns), as you have nothing to do with us or Papa. I suppose you wish to have every thing under your own direction; but I assure you it will not be so, as what the physicians say will be sufficient. You talk of taking Papa under your protection: mention it to him, and see what he will say to you. Your letter has been read to Dr. Carrick, and he says they are your own inventions what you have asserted; and to-morrow Mr. Osborne and Mr. Roberts shall hear your language to a defenceless girl." She was in some respects able to defend herself, and with a considerable degree of spirit. "You are an unprincipled fellow, and I am certain you would deprive my poor mother and her family of bread, if you could get us in your power. I should have been ashamed to present such an account to Papa as you did, taking advantage of his situation to [433] get every penny you could: you do something or other with the money, for no one sees the money but yourself. You say you pay for Edmund's child: you assert an abominable falsehood, as Papa allows a hundred a year to Edmund's widow for its maintenance. However, we never wish to have any thing more to do with you. Thank heavens we know your character before too late. Dare to write! Should you do, your letter will be returned unopened."

Now this letter, and particularly the passage "we have you in our power more than you think for," pretty strongly marks dominion over the deceased, and that the probable use to be made of Reginald's letter would be, in the exercise of such power, to work a false impression on the deceased. Indeed, various parts of the letter tend deeply to shew the sort of impression which had already been attempted in order to alienate the deceased, and to prejudice him against his son Reginald, and to make the deceased a mere instrument in the hands of his wife and her children.

What was now to be done? The first thing was to go to Messrs. Coutts, and induce them to waive the necessity of having the drafts countersigned by Carrick; for if that attempt should have succeeded, Mrs. Blewitt would have obtained a complete command over the property. On the 26th of January, 1832, this attempt was made, and Sir Edward Antrobus gives the following account of what occurred on that occasion:—"I only recollect to have seen Major Blewitt once after his paralytic attack, and then he was disabled from using his right side; he walked with the assistance of a person to lean upon, and his speech was so indistinct that none but persons accustomed to it could [434] understand him: he was unintelligible to me, and I took some pains to understand him, because it was of importance to us that I should understand him, the object of his visit to the banking-house being, as Mrs. Blewitt stated, to cancel the order we had, not to honour his drafts unless countersigned by Mr. Carrick. Mrs. Blewitt stated as much to me, and put it to him in my presence whether that was not his object; but he shook his head, and uttered some indistinct sounds which I did not understand. I understood from the shake of the head that he did not mean to cancel the order; he appeared irritable at the time, and Mrs. Blewitt did not explain what he meant, nor press the matter further; nothing was done; and I was very glad to see him go away without cancelling the order; for, from what I observed of him, I considered he was not in a fit state to manage his affairs himself."

This attempt to get the order cancelled having thus failed, the next step was to persuade Carrick again to countersign the drafts: and though Reginald Blewitt was unable to come to town, yet he had sent to Mr. Roberts full power to act for him, and in the kindest manner had expressed a strong wish that every facility should be given to provide for the comfort and accommodation of his father. Accordingly Dr. Arnott, who had attended the deceased when attacked with paralysis, was again called in;

and he gives this account of the state in which he found the deceased on that occasion. "I saw Major Blewitt again on the 2d of February (1832), I was called in by Mrs. Blewitt, and met Mr. Carrick, to give my opinion whether Mr. Carrick would be justified in countersigning drafts drawn by Major Blewitt, as he had done. [435] I examined the major to ascertain his state, and how far he was fit to act for himself; the result of my examination was that there was more of muscular energy; he was not so languid; he did not drop his head so much, he could take his meals, and move from one room to another with assistance: in these respects there was a slight improvement, and perhaps the same degree of improvement in the state of his mind: but there was still that slowness, that inability to combine more than the very smallest number of ideas, or to review or compare past occurrences; he was incapable of making present to his mind any complex subject, and I came to the conclusion that he was clearly incompetent to the management of his own affairs, but that, under the circumstances of the family, Mr. Carrick would be justified in countersigning the drafts for the ordinary household expences: but I told Mr. Carrick and Mrs. Blewitt that, for any thing beyond the ordinary household expences, the concurrence of the members of the major's family, who were interested in his property, should be had. Mrs. Blewitt had informed me that it was wished to advance money to place out some of the children, and I advised her that a sum for such a purpose should only be taken with the consent of the parties interested, and I recommended her, as she told me that a gentleman authorized to act for the other branches of the family was expected in a few days, by all means to wait till then." Mr. Carrick's evidence is much to the same effect.

Such, then, is the account of the state of the deceased's capacity on the 2d of February. In consequence of what passed at this interview Mr. Carrick again undertakes to countersign the [436] drafts: he informs Osborne and Roberts of this arrangement, who agree to see the deceased on the 8th of February; and it is material to notice what occurred at their interview. Mr. Roberts gives the following account:—"We were with the deceased about an hour; Mr. Osborne and myself talked on the subject of our visit, on the appearance or health of the major, putting questions occasionally to him, which he sometimes answered by a monosyllable, sometimes by an inclination or shake of the head: simple questions, such as related to his health, and of that kind he seemed to understand and answer. On this occasion Mrs. Blewitt spoke of Reginald Blewitt's letter, in answer to the communication to him that Mr. Carrick had refused to countersign the drafts, and she certainly expressed herself with great violence against Reginald, and said that she would never overlook his letter. She denied that she had ever pressed the major to sign a draft for the purchase of a commission in the army, or that she, or any one in the house, had behaved unkindly to him; and she appealed to him whether it was so or not in this way, 'Now has any one in the house behaved unkindly to you, or have I or any one in the house behaved unkind to you?' He made no answer, and took no notice whatever of what she said: she repeated it, and again he took no notice: upon which she left him, and went to the window in tears. I told Mrs. Blewitt that Carrick had informed me of Dr. Arnott's opinion, that the major was not competent to the management of his affairs; she admitted it to be true, not in words, but she did not contradict it." Again, "I said on the behalf of Mr. Reginald that he [437] would do any thing that was right to relieve the family from inconvenience, and I undertook to draw up the request, which was agreed upon, and to forward it to Mr. Reginald for his signature. Of this arrangement, and the conversation concerning it, all which passed in the major's hearing, he took no notice—no part in it whatever by word or sign; he evinced no interest; he expressed neither surprise nor resentment against his son Reginald, myself, or any other person, and Mrs. Blewitt came into the arrangement without referring to him in any way. And when I mentioned to her the annuities, for payment of which application had been made to Coutts and Co., and suggested that, as they were charged upon the Monmouthshire estates, they had better be paid out of the rents of them by Reginald Blewitt, she assented to that without consulting the major: he was in a state of complete listlessness and apathy throughout; I did not think of addressing myself to him alone on any point of business, for he was evidently incapable of attending to it."

Here ends the interview of the 8th of February; and such is the account given of the deceased's state, and of Mrs. Blewitt's conduct. In consequence of what then passed, Roberts wrote to Carrick to this effect: it is the exhibit No. 22.

"Dear Sir,—It being very desirable to avoid the exposure, annoyance, and expense of agitating the question how far Major Blewitt may be capable of managing his affairs, and in order that his comforts and necessities may be properly provided for, we request that you will have the goodness to countersign the major's cheques as heretofore, namely, that they appear to be ac-[438]-cording to his wishes, so far as he can express them, and be not for other than ordinary household and necessary purposes, and upon the distinct understanding, as required by you, that such countersigning is to be considered only as consequent upon this request, and that you shall not be deemed as expressing any opinion upon Major Blewitt's state of mind, or capability to manage his affairs, but such opinion is to be as free, uncontrolled, and unprejudiced, as if you had never countersigned such drafts."

This authority, having been signed by Mr. Reginald Blewitt, was sent to Mrs. Blewitt for her signature. Thus an arrangement was effected for Mr. Carrick to countersign the drafts; and I may here observe that the paper was not calculated to cause the deceased to take offence at his son: if it were indeed at all calculated to give offence to him, it would, I think, rather be as against his wife; but I do not see that, unless perhaps to Mr. Carrick, it was likely to occasion offence to any party. At the interview upon the subject of this arrangement, not the least intention of any steps to take out a commission of lunacy, or in any other way to interfere with Mrs. Blewitt and the family, was suggested; on the contrary, the letter which I have just read expressly declared that the object of all parties was "to avoid agitating the question how far Major Blewitt was capable of managing his affairs:" yet in that state of things, on the 11th of February, three days after this arrangement had been settled, Mrs. Blewitt and her son, Mr. Thomas Blewitt, took the deceased, found out a Mr. Binns at his office in Essex-street, and represented to him that they came for the sole purpose of preventing a commission of lunacy issuing [439] against Major Blewitt, and the management of his person being taken from his wife and family; and to this end, before they quit the office, a most extraordinary instrument is drawn up by Binns: it is the exhibit marked No. 24, and is in these terms: "I hereby authorize and require you, Thomas Binns, to enter a caveat against any commission, wherein I am in any way concerned, being any way proceeded upon without due notice to you, Thomas Binns; and I hereby further authorize and require you to retain Sir James Scarlett, Sir E. Sugden, Mr. Horne, and any other counsel generally you may think proper on my behalf; also that you require Dr. Macmichael to attend upon me at my house, at 26 Phillimore Place, Kensington, on Monday next, at three o'clock; and I hereby authorize and require you to act in all my affairs as my attorney and solicitor, and as you shall think proper or be advised; and for so doing this shall be your sufficient warrant and authority. Dated this 11th of February, 1832." (Signed) "EDWARD BLEWITT."

These are pretty extensive powers taken at one interview from a person in the condition of the deceased—only able to pronounce monosyllables—in the hands of these persons—his wife and his illegitimate son, and taken by an individual who had a very slight knowledge of the deceased: for who is Mr. Binns, and what was his connexion with the deceased? Mr. Binns' history of himself is that, after having been five years in an office at Chesterfield, he came to London in 1812 for his advancement, and became a clerk in Mr. Stevenson's office at 70*l.* per annum; he was about twenty when he came to London, for at his examination he describes himself as forty years old; [440] that in 1818, having by degrees become senior or managing clerk, he was articled to Stevenson. Reginald Blewitt was also an articled clerk to Stevenson; and the deceased was a client of the house. When Stevenson retired from the business Binns quitted the office, set up in business for himself, and sent circulars to some of Stevenson's late clients. In 1826 he was employed by the deceased, but received his instructions from Edmund Blewitt, who was at the bar, in some business connected with the Llanturnam estate. In 1827 the bill was sent in, and it was paid by a draft in 1828. Binns once or twice, in 1826, saw the deceased at his office, but he had never seen him from 1826 to 1832, unless by some accidental meeting in the street: he was not employed to prepare the instrument of 1828; and it was at the office of Bicknell and Roberts, Stevenson's successors, that the deceased executed his will of October, 1830; and there was not any intercourse or business between him and Binns, nor was he in any way employed by the deceased after 1826, till this interview in February, 1832. There is no evidence that he even knew Binns was living in 1832, much less where he lived, though Mrs. Blewitt knew there was such a person; for Miss Blewitt, in her second letter, speaks of applying to him: but on the 11th of February, as I have mentioned, Mrs. Blewitt and her son hunt him out, and on their way to his office Mrs. Blewitt receives payment at Coutts' of a draft countersigned by Carrick. This shews that the arrangement in that respect was speedily carried into effect, and therefore that no intention to embarrass Mrs. Blewitt and her family could exist.

The result of what passed at Binns' on the 11th [441] pretty clearly shews, as I have stated, that the ostensible object of going there was to prevent a commission of lunacy, and to defeat Reginald Blewitt and Roberts in any attempt to get possession of the deceased, and the management of his property: that is hardly to be doubted, from the paper drawn up by Binns, and to which the deceased's signature is obtained. It is then important to see, first, what account Binns gives of this interview, and more especially of the state and condition of the deceased; for, if his account is quite inconsistent with all the other evidence in the cause, particularly as to that important fact which could be ascertained with more precision and certainty than the state of his mind, namely, the deceased's power of speech; and should, in that respect, his evidence be nearly if not quite incredible, there is an end of Mr. Binns' testimony, and of the case itself. For Mr. Binns is the only witness to the instrument propounded, and unless the Court can venture to give him credit—nay, full credit—it is quite impossible that the instrument should be established. I should not, therefore, do justice to Mr. Binns himself, or to the Court, or to the parties, were I not to read the whole of his deposition on the 10th and 12th articles; for it gives the whole detail of this most important interview:

"When Major Blewitt came to me in Essex-street, in February, 1832, he evinced great satisfaction at finding me: he had been seeking me in New Inn, where I had chambers when he employed me before; he had met with some difficulty in finding out where I had removed to, and he seemed excited with pleasure at having at last found me: he shook hands with me with the [442] left hand, intimating that he had not the use of the right hand for the purpose. It was on the 11th of the month, and his wife, and eldest son by her, were with him: he told me that he required my advice in consequence of what his son, Mr. Reginald Blewitt, and Mr. Roberts were doing respecting his affairs: he seemed to resent very much their interference, and he shewed me the letter (the exhibit No. 22), signed by Reginald Blewitt and by Mrs. Blewitt. He complained that Reginald Blewitt wished to control him in the expenditure of his income and the management of his affairs, and declared that he would not submit to their interference, and would not allow any person to sign his cheques for him" [though one had only just been presented, signed by Mr. Carrick]. "He alluded to the conduct of his son formerly, and to their reconciliation, and what he had done for him, as hurt, that, after having restored him to his favour, he should just then, when from his state of illness he might require more indulgence, make an attempt to limit his expenditure. He seemed to feel it as a bad return for his kindness that Reginald Blewitt should attempt to take advantage of his illness, and to control his affairs; and it was to prevent that control, and to meet what Reginald Blewitt and Roberts might intend to do, as far as it could be collected from the letter which he handed me, that he then required my advice and assistance. He deeply resented this attempt of his son and Roberts, and expressed his determination to have the management of his affairs himself; and he gave me directions to discharge his son from interfering any further in the management of his estates in Monmouthshire, or of any of his concerns, and to [443] obtain an account from him. After Major Blewitt had thus explained himself to me, I put it to him whether he apprehended that, when they knew what his determination was, they would agitate the question of his capacity, and he replied 'he thought they would.' I thought so too, from the wording of the letter, and that they would apply for a commission of lunacy; and therefore I advised him as to the precautions I thought necessary to be taken against such a step on their part—among other things, to see Dr. Macmichael, that he might report on his capacity to continue in the management of his affairs without control, and he adopted my suggestion at once. He seemed quite apprehensive, unless they were prevented, that Reginald Blewitt and Roberts would possess themselves, by some means, of the management; he seemed to entertain a bad opinion of them, and he signed an authority to me, requiring me to act for him according to the advice I then gave him, and generally on his affairs, as his attorney and solicitor. I wrote out the authority at the time, requiring me to enter a caveat against the issuing of the commission, to retain particular counsel, and to procure the attendance of Dr. Macmichael upon him. He fixed the time for the doctor's attendance himself, and gave me his residence (his own), with which I was not then acquainted, and I not only read this authority to him, but he conned it over himself, and went from his own chair to mine, in which he sat, to sign it: he was more than an hour with me, I should think, on the occasion, and I was anxious and particular in the advice I gave him to meet the circumstances in which he might be placed when the other parties should find he was determined [444] to have the uncontrolled management of his affairs, and not to permit their interference. As Major Blewitt was leaving my office he told me there was another letter (No. 23) connected with that which had been the subject of our conference, and he desired his wife or son to send it to me; and I think it was sent to me in a day or two. Major Blewitt said he wished me to see it."

It is impossible to read this account, given by Mr. Binns, without being struck that he has, on this 11th of February, represented the deceased as not only possessed of perfect capacity and intelligence, but also that he had full power of originating intentions, and of communicating and explaining his objects. It would hardly be supposed that the deceased, at this time, laboured under any difficulty of speech; yet from other evidence in the cause it is quite clear that he had hardly the power of speech—that he could only express himself in monosyllables, or at most, with a great effort, in short sentences. Even Dr. Macmichael admits that the deceased had very great difficulty in order to express himself; and he gives only two instances in which, in the course of his visits, the deceased attempted to utter a sentence. Dr. Macmichael's conduct confirms his evidence; for notwithstanding that the deceased could only write with his left hand, yet Dr. Macmichael gets him to write down answers to some of his questions, that he might be the better able to understand him than by word of mouth; while, according to Binns, the deceased would appear to have been in possession of perfect intelligence of mind, and of the power of expressing his wishes and intentions without any difficulty whatever.

Nor has Mr. Binns left it open to the supposi-[445]-tion that he collected what was said by the deceased from explanations given by Mrs. Blewitt; for in his cross-examination he has negatived any such supposition. "Major Blewitt's visit to me on the 11th February last was not the result of any previous arrangement: I had not seen him before that, except accidentally, since March, 1826. Sitting down, he did not appear much altered since I had last seen him: he appeared thinner, and when he got up he required assistance, he could not walk without it. I recognized him immediately: I saw at once there was something the matter with his side; he appeared indisposed, but not very feeble; I think when he entered my office he was leaning on his wife's arm; he was the first person who addressed me; and himself explained the object of his visit. At first I had some difficulty in understanding him, but when I found what was the matter, and directed my attention particularly to him, I understood him without difficulty; he was altogether intelligible, and I had no occasion to have recourse either to Mrs. Blewitt or her son to interpret what he said; they did not even offer to do so; I had no occasion to lead him by questions; he did not merely answer by signs, or by monosyllables."

Now can this account be correct? Can the Court venture to rely upon the testimony of this person where he is a single witness—single he is to the instructions, and to the preparation and drawing up of the paper propounded? Without his evidence there is not a tittle of proof that the transaction, even such as it is, which he has represented, ever passed. But it does not seem that at this interview with Binns, on the 11th of February, there was the slightest intention of doing any testament-[446]-ary act; the object was to get an authority from the deceased to prevent Reginald Blewitt and Roberts from issuing a commission of lunacy against him, and to enable Binns to supersede Reginald in the management of his father's estates. In his deposition in chief Mr. Binns says that he was directed to send to Reginald for the account between him and the deceased; but what was Binns' conduct? Does he write to Mr. Reginald Blewitt, who had been his fellow clerk, who was the legitimate son of the deceased, and had, as he knew, been employed in preparing his will? No.

The whole of this important transaction is carried on behind his back; he is not even apprised of his father's displeasure.

What is the effect of this state of facts, founded upon the history previous to the 11th of February, and upon what occurred on that day at Binns' office—looking back to the application in December, 1831, for the purchase of a commission; the deceased's refusal; his state of excitement; his wish to change his house, with Carrick's refusal to sanction it; the refusal of Carrick, on the 6th of January, to countersign the drafts; the visit of Roberts and Osborne on the 8th of January, when it was agreed to write to Reginald; Anne's letter of the 9th, misrepresenting the cause of Carrick's refusal; Reginald's answer on detecting its falsehood; her menacing reply on the 23d; the attempt on the 26th at Coutts' to get rid of the countersignature; Dr. Arnott's visit on the 6th of February, and Carrick again agreeing to countersign; the visit of Roberts and Osborne on the 8th; the deceased's apathy to what was passing; the fact of Mrs. Blewitt's attempt, by referring to Reginald's letter, to excite the deceased [447] against him; the authority on the 9th, expressly wishing to avoid the exposure of the deceased's state, and by which Reginald promptly consented to every thing for his comfort; the receiving a countersigned draft on the 11th at Coutts'; the false account given by Binns of the deceased's condition on that day; Binns' obtaining on that day, upon a fraudulent representation, the power of attorney with the deceased's signature to it—they are facts that do, in my mind, wear the appearance of a gross fraud and circumvention on this paralytic old man, which he was either not able to understand, or which, if he could detect and understand in any degree, he was not able to resist and defeat. This previous history thus throws on the whole case a strong suspicion, strengthened by the fact that though, according to Binns, he was authorized to supersede Reginald as his father's agent, the whole of this important business on the 11th was concealed from Reginald: every thing respecting it was clandestine, and conducted behind his back.

Having procured the deceased's signature to the power of attorney, the plan of the parties immediately changed: the object was no longer to prevent a fancied commission of lunacy, but it now was to get the deceased to sign a codicil materially altering his will. As, however, Dr. Arnott and Mr. Carrick had expressed an unfavourable opinion of his capacity to do general acts of business, it became a measure of necessity to resort to some other medical man of reputation, but who had no previous knowledge of the deceased, his family, or connexions. Dr. Macmichael, and perhaps they could not have selected a more respectable man, was accordingly called in, expressly with a view [448] to decide whether the deceased was competent "to make a will:" this he states both in his certificate and in his deposition. The certificate is to this effect: (a)—

"Having been requested to visit Major Blewitt with a view to ascertain his competency to make a will, I went to see him for the first time on the 13th of February, 1832, and was introduced to him by Mr. Binns, of Essex-street; Major Blewitt, who is about seventy, labours under the effect of paralysis, which attacked him about fourteen months ago: he has lost the use of his right side, is unable to walk alone, and his speech is so much affected that he articulates with great effort and difficulty: his attempts at conversation are therefore chiefly confined to the monosyllables 'yes' and 'no,' though occasionally he can utter an entire sentence; for example, I asked him 'whether he often went to London?' he replied audibly and distinctly, 'No, I have no occasion for it;' and so on." (b)

(a) June 27, 1832.—On the allegation propounding the codicil being debated, objections were (inter alia) taken, by the King's advocate and Nicholl, to the introduction of this certificate, annexed as an exhibit, and also to the plea setting forth the opinion and inferences of Carrick; but the Court, in directing parts of the allegation to be reformed, overruled the objections, stating that, without the examination of Dr. Macmichael and of Mr. Carrick upon the allegation, the certificate, opinion, and inferences would not be admissible as evidence.

(b) The certificate continued thus: "Upon my being told that about last Christmas he wished to go to the Tavistock Hotel, Covent Garden, and upon asking him 'why he wished to go there,' he answered, 'Because he had been formerly used to go there, and wished for a change of scene;' this is, as I am told, quite true. Since the attack of paralysis he has learned to write with his left hand, and in my presence he wrote his name, 'Edward Blewitt,' legibly. On my next visit, on the 15th, I requested him

[449] Dr. Macmichael visited the deceased on the 13th, 15th, 17th of February, and he signed the certificate [450] on the 18th; and his account is satisfactory to shew that to a certain extent, and for some purposes, the deceased possessed a testamentary capacity. There is no material difference as to facts between Dr. Macmichael and Mr. Carrick: the deceased had some degree of memory and understanding; he was not irrational; he was not a lunatic; there was no aberration; no absolute idiotcy, nor total imbecility: he could answer correctly ordinary questions, and assign a reason for his ordinary conduct; as, when asked "whether he often went to London," he answered, "No, I have no occasion for it." So, in regard to memory, when asked "how many children he had," "who was the colonel and lieutenant-colonel of his regiment," or, "how much money he had at his banker's" (probably a subject often mentioned to him, and then recently a matter of much anxiety and concern), he might answer correctly; or, in regard to his cheques, he would probably (aware of their usual amount), if a cheque were drawn for 2000l., instead of 250l., have taken alarm at the sum, and refused to sign it, as he did the draft for the son's commission—such a degree of memory and understanding the deceased did possess; but had he that mind, memory, and understanding to enable him to make this codicil?

The degree of capacity retained by Major Blewitt might have been sufficient to do a common testamentary and natural act; he might have been competent to make a reasonable provision for natural children not before provided for, or for a faithful servant, more especially if such a provision were supported by previous declarations of intention, or by strong probabilities arising out of a clear and well ascertained state of circumstances. But what is the act to be here done? [451] it is not merely to alter a will recently made, by which he had provided largely for Mrs. Blewitt and her children, but to alter a most important part of that will, and thus, contrary to every previous testamentary disposition, take away the residue from his legitimate children.

In support of this change, attempted after the paralytic attack, there is no previous declaration—not the slightest intimation that his will, made only six weeks before that attack, was to be altered in any respect, nor was there in the conduct of the former residuary legatees any real cause of departure from his will. If Dr. Macmichael to make the following addition, 8l. 4s. 2d., and 3l. 18s. 6d., and without being in the least assisted or prompted he wrote underneath the same 12l. 2s. 8d., in very legible figures. The cheques he had lately drawn upon his bankers, Messrs. Coutts, had been countersigned by his apothecary Mr. Carrick, of Kensington; but to this arrangement he now objects. When I asked him if he knew the amount of his balance at his banker's, he wrote down upon a piece of paper 6000l.; and I have ascertained since that this is within a few pounds the precise amount. Mr. Carrick, whom I met on my second visit, informs me that when a compliance with his request to go to the Tavistock Hotel was refused, he gave signs of anger and impatience, and drew his finger across his throat, as if he would commit suicide; this was regarded at the time as indicating unsoundness of mind; but when it is recollected that Major Blewitt is deprived, in a great degree, of the power of speech, ought it not rather to be considered as the readiest mode he possessed of expressing his indignation at the control attempted to be exercised over his movements, and the gratification of what he might deem a most reasonable wish? On my third visit, after the interval of two days, he wrote down correct answers to various questions I put to him, which related to the number of children he had had by his first marriage, the yearly value or rent of his estate in Monmouthshire, when he made his last will, who drew it up, how many children he had by his present wife? He told me also the names of the colonel and lieutenant-colonel of the York Fencibles, in which he formerly served, and which he had quitted for many years. In my several interviews with him I could not discover that he laboured under any delusion; he appeared to think correctly upon all the subjects upon which I questioned him, as far as it was possible to catch and thoroughly understand his answers. What is said to himself he seems completely to understand, but the difficulty of the case consists in being sure you comprehend his replies. Upon the whole, I am of opinion that, if due time be allowed him to reflect, and if proper caution be used to avoid mistaking his intentions, that he is competent to make a will. But as a will made under such circumstances may possibly become hereafter a subject of litigation, it would be more prudent to take the opinion of another experienced physician." (Signed) "WILLIAM MACMICHAEL, M.D."

---

had been aware of all the facts, and that without any real offence by his legitimate children to the deceased, subsequent to the execution of his last will, and that, on the other hand, after he became paralytic, false impressions and feelings—for instance, that his son Reginald was about to deprive him of self-management—were forced upon and excited in the deceased with no just foundation—he (Dr. M.) probably would not have been of opinion that Major Blewitt had capacity, firmness of mind, and quickness of apprehension sufficient to take a view of all the circumstances connected with his will, and form any thing like a disposing judgment: he would, I think, have hesitated in attesting such a codicil. Carrick was aware of most of the facts, and therefore, though he deposes to similar traits, shewing a degree of capacity, yet, in his judgment, the deceased had not a sufficient capacity for the purpose of making this disposition.

But inferences, drawn from the conduct of a witness and from the res gestæ, are generally safer grounds upon which to rely than mere opi-[452]-nion. And what was Dr. Macmichael's conduct? He paid three visits to the deceased—so doubtful is his state of capacity!—before he formed his final opinion; when at length he ventured to write the certificate of that opinion it was hesitatingly worded, for he concludes by recommending the family to take "the opinion of some other experienced physician." How completely does this conduct (there being no access of disorder in the mean time) contradict Binns' account of the deceased's state on the 11th of February! For if the deceased had been on that day in the enjoyment of that full state of mind, memory, and understanding, and also of powers of speech, so that without assistance he could have communicated his views and wishes, would Dr. Macmichael have hesitated a moment as to his perfect capacity either to make or alter a will, or manage his whole concerns?

Again, what is the sort of alteration that it is suggested to Dr. Macmichael that the deceased wished to make? The removal of Roberts as a trustee and executor, and the substitution of Binns. The deceased appeared to have been set against Roberts, and as he had been with the deceased so recently as the 8th, there might have been no difficulty in making an impression prejudicial to him. But independent of such a false impression, the merely changing a trustee or an executor does not require the same degree of capacity as an important alteration in the disposition of the residue, and that it is which here was attempted. When capacity is in question, the inquiry always is—Was it adequate to the act? and that inquiry becomes more imperative when false impressions—which are strongly to be inferred in this case—have been apparently fixed in the mind [453] of a testator, and he has become a mere instrument in the hands of interested persons. Here Dr. Macmichael's own conduct shews that he considered the deceased liable to undue influence; for while probing his capacity he desired, on two or three occasions, to be left alone with him: even at his third interview, on the 17th, when he still felt the difficulty of deciding as to the state of the deceased's understanding, he required the absence of the wife and of Binns, in order to be satisfied that he was not under their influence and control. Indeed, what he collects relative to the deceased's family, to his not being on good terms with his son Reginald, and to his dislike to Roberts, he is by no means certain was derived from the deceased himself: he cannot distinguish between what he learned from him, and what from Mrs. Blewitt, and from Binns; and that the deceased's answers were correctly given, he only judges from the information of those same individuals: this is not immaterial, and he states it in his deposition to the 27th interrogatory.

Looking, then, to the evidence of Dr. Macmichael, and with full credit for its truth, though he does establish in this helpless old man a certain degree of understanding, sufficient, under some circumstances and with due precaution—for he says "that he would have required the assistance of a good and faithful person, and one who was accustomed to him"—to give effect to a testamentary act, yet connected with all the facts which appear in the evidence before me, and applied to so imperfect an instrument as the present codicil, that degree of understanding to which he deposes is by no means sufficient; nor, indeed, to satisfy my mind that, even in the exercise of that remnant of understanding, the deceased was not [454] acting under control and the influence of false impressions fraudulently made upon his mind: and to rely on proof of a more perfect capacity, a more decided intention and volition, and of a free and intelligent agency, upon the testimony of Mr. Binns, is, after the account that he has given of the interview of the 11th of February, what the Court, though with reluctance it may feel itself bound to express such opinion, cannot venture to do.

Again, the entire history of the codicil in question depends on the single testimony of this Mr. Binns. Carrick was not present at any of the conversations deposed to respecting the paper: Dr. Macmichael was not aware, as he expressly says, in answer to the 29th interrogatory, that any such transaction had taken place till after the deceased's death, or at least till he had become quite incapable: he was not trusted to be present; he was not made acquainted with the nature and object of the act to be done, nor even that any act had been done. Here, then, was contrivance, and also concealment, even as respected Dr. Macmichael. It rests, therefore, upon Mr. Binns alone to prove the case: however, for the reasons already assigned, I shall not in my further examination of the case refer to the details in his evidence, but shall look at and consider his conduct.

Now Mr. Binns asserts that he received, on the three several days upon which Dr. Macmichael visited the deceased after he was first called in, full, clear, and final instructions from the deceased as to his intended alterations, yet Mr. Binns does not commit to paper one single word respecting them. On the 20th or 21st of February, for he is not quite certain as to the day, Binns carried Dr. Macmichael's certificate to the deceased, and again read his will over to him, recapitulating in the most [455] careful manner all the instructions that he had before received from him; and it was then understood, as Binns states the matter, that he should draw out a codicil—that was settled and approved; yet again on this occasion there were no heads of the intended alterations—there was not even a memorandum put down in writing; this is, on the part of Mr. Binns, a strange mode of proceeding, and most extraordinary conduct.

What is his further conduct? Though instructed, as he says, to draw out this codicil, and though in respect to it he had, at no less than four interviews, found the deceased's mind quite uniform, yet no rough draft even of a codicil made its appearance till the 26th, and all this is accounted for by this singularly cautious man under the pretence that there was no hurry, as Dr. Macmichael had told him that there was a probability of the deceased's living for several years; but Dr. Macmichael does not so depose: he says, on the 24th interrogatory, "I do not think I could have told Mr. Binns that Major Blewitt would probably live many years, for that was not my opinion;" and the very nature of the disorder was sufficient of itself to contradict any such probability.

On Sunday, the 26th, Binns went again to the deceased—not with a codicil, as he says the deceased had directed, prepared for execution, but—with this draft hastily written on the back of some paper before used for other purposes. But what passed on that occasion? The deceased, if he then had any mind, had altered it as to part of this codicil, for an annuity given under it to the grand-daughter was disapproved of and struck through with a pencil, and the wife's name erased from a share in the residue. When these alterations were [456] made, Mr. Binns states that he read the draft codicil over to the deceased, who approved of it, and the draft was finally settled.

Then, supposing the deceased to have had a capacity adequate to the act, this last point—as to final intention—remains to be considered.

On the 26th of February, after the alterations were made in the draft codicil, Binns states that it was read over to and approved of by Major Blewitt. The witness thus deposes on the 19th article: "The only point Major Blewitt had not made up his mind upon at this time was the amount of the legacy to myself; on every other point he had fully and finally made up his mind I am perfectly satisfied, and I had nothing further to do but to have the codicil copied fair for execution, and to see it executed. I said nothing to Major Blewitt as to having it copied and ready for execution, nor did he to me, nor was any time fixed for the execution of it. I felt that the whole matter was settled, and that I was to see it completed; and that as Major Blewitt was to all appearance in the same health as when Dr. Macmichael had told me he might live several years, there was no occasion for any hurry." Again, on the 20th article, he says: "Major Blewitt had unquestionably finally and fully made up his mind to alter his will as it is altered by this draft codicil."

It is, perhaps, rather bold in the witness to swear that the deceased "had unquestionably, finally and fully made up his mind," for at most this could only be matter of opinion. But it is safer for the Court to look to facts and conduct. What had already taken place? On the 20th of February the new disposition was repeated and settled for the fourth time, and the codicil was to be prepared. Mr. Binns, however, did not [457] prepare it, and on the 26th the disposition was altered; the legacy to Binns himself remained still in blank, and on that day there were no directions to prepare a codicil.(a)

[458] Dr. Macmichael, in his certificate, had recommended an experienced physician to be called in, [459] and on this 26th of February the deceased himself expressed a wish again to see Dr. Macmichael. Binns thus deposes on the 20th article to this point. "After I had gone over the draft codicil with Major Blewitt on the Sunday, I sat in conversation with him some short time, and as I was about to leave him he said 'he should like to see Dr. Macmichael again, and asked me to appoint him at three o'clock on Tuesday.' I asked him 'if he wished me to attend him at the same time,' he said 'Yes.' I accordingly made the appointment." What was Binn's conduct in the meantime? Did he have the rough and altered draft copied? No. Yet, is it possible, if the alterations were finally settled, that he would not have had a codicil drawn up ready for execution on the Tuesday, when Dr. Macmichael might have sanctioned the act and attested it. This observa-[460]-tion, however, applies to the Tuesday; but there was, assuming a sufficient capacity, at least the postponement of one day in effecting these alterations, and that caused by the deceased himself; for if the instructions were final, an opportunity of executing on the Monday a codicil prepared for them was lost; and that because the deceased wished again to see Dr. Macmichael and Binns. But further—assuming a sufficient capacity—what

(a) The following are portions of Mr. Binns' evidence as to his interview with the deceased respecting the alterations in his will:—

On the 17th article Binns deposed: "On the 13th of February, as Dr. Macmichael took his leave, Major Blewitt beckoned me to remain, and desired his wife to fetch his will from the next room and shew it me." . . . "I, having read it, read it to Major B., and he pointed to the clause of appointment of Mr. Roberts as an executor; and said in an angry and distressed manner, 'That must be out, and your name in instead:' when I came to the residuary clause he pointed to it and said 'not to go to either Reginald or Frances,' or to that effect: he seemed quite familiar with the will, and the parts he wished altered." . . . "As I went home with Dr. Macmichael I consulted him on the competency of Major B. to alter his will; and I remember Dr. M., besides giving me his opinion as to the competency of Major B., said 'he was likely to live, or, that it was not improbable he would live, many or several years.'" . . . "Mrs. Blewitt was present on this occasion, and the other occasions afterwards, when he spoke to me of these alterations. Thomas Rogers Blewitt, the son, might be, now and then. I was with Major B. on the days of Dr. Macmichael's visits; and with respect to the intended alterations, Major B., both on the second and third occasions, expressed himself as nearly as possible as he had on the first."

On the 18th article: "'I believe' it was on the 20th of February last, but it was either on that or the following day, I saw Major B." . . . "I, to avoid all possibility of mistake, asked him 'if he meant me to be an executor and trustee with his wife in the place of Roberts;' he said 'Yes, and look after the children, and their interest in life;' adding that he should leave me something to remunerate me for my trouble. I then learnt from Major or Mrs. B. that he was allowing the daughter of his son Edmund 100*l.* a year, which he told me he wished to continue to her, as she would take less than Reginald or Frances under the settlement." "He answered every question I put to him in a perfect, clear, and intelligible manner." "I asked him 'to whom he would leave the residue, since he would not leave it to Reginald and Fanny,' and I understood him to say, pointing to his wife, who, as well as I recollect, was all the time present, 'All to her and her children.'" "I then read over the will to him, pointing out what I understood to be the alterations; I am certain that he understood and approved of my drawing out a codicil in conformity with my statement of the alterations, and I told him I should draw out a codicil in conformity with what I understood to be his wish—that his will should stand except with respect to Roberts—the grandchild's annuity, and the altered disposition of the residue: and I clearly understood that he wished me to draw a codicil to that effect."

On the 19th article: "According to the instructions, I drew a codicil; but my

is there to shew that this interview with Dr. Macmichael was not for the purpose of consulting and reconsidering with him these intended alterations; and perhaps with a view to make a fresh disposition? How then can it be safely sworn that on the 26th the deceased "unquestionably had finally made up his mind?"

Binns further deposes on the 20th article: "On Tuesday, the 28th, Dr. Macmichael and I went to see the deceased; we found him very unwell, in a drowsy and lethargic state; Dr. Macmichael said it would be better not to say any thing to him; he prescribed for him, ordered him to be cupped, and we left." The deceased is restored, and Dr. Macmichael deposes that he became better than he had ever seen him, so much so that he says, "On the very day before he was seized with the fatal attack of apoplexy he was better than I had seen him; instead of finding him moping by the fire, he was sitting at the window amusing himself with what was passing out of doors." Yet, from the 28th he considered his full recovery hopeless; for on the 31st interrogatory he answers: "When I saw him (on the 28th) his entire recovery was out of the question; it was impossible to foretell when the fatal attack of apoplexy might supervene: it is very possible that I might have said to Mr. Binns [461] that by the use of the means I had prescribed he might be restored to the same state in which he was when I had seen him before, and in a few days—an anticipation in fact verified, for on the day immediately preceding the fatal attack his head was more relieved than it had been during the whole of my attendance." Still, notwithstanding the opinion of Dr. Macmichael that the deceased might get better, but that "the entire recovery of the deceased was out of the question," and notwithstanding that, on the 28th, Binns had told Mrs. Blewitt that if she would send for him when the own business pressing, and wishing, under the circumstances, to allow Major B. full time to consider of the act he was about to do, and feeling secure of what Dr. Macmichael had told me of the probability of his living several years, that there was no immediate haste necessary, and no danger in the delay of a few days, I did not wait upon Major B. till Sunday, the 26th, with the draft codicil I had prepared: I had written it on three sheets of rough draft paper, on the two sides of the first sheet, and on one side only of the other two sheets; the other sides of those two sheets having been previously used for another instrument, unconnected with the codicil or Major B. The draft codicil was quite in a rough state, with several alterations in it. I read the will and then the draft codicil to Major B.: Mrs. B. being present. Of some parts he approved, of others he disapproved: the grandchild's annuity was expunged; the deceased, pointing to that part of the will which referred to the settlement, said 'she would take her father's share.' I asked him, as I thought if she wanted the allowance in his life-time, she would after his death, 'whether he thought she would take her father's share under the settlement;' he said 'Yes, and I leave her no more.' The next part objected to was that clause giving the wife a share of the residue; Major B., pointing to that part of the will which gave her an annuity of 600l., said 'No more, that's enough.' I struck the lines through with a pencil. I asked him whether he meant to make any preference among his children; whether he would provide more for the youngest than the eldest? He said, 'No; if I give more to one than another, they will be jealous:' and (in answer to inquiries) he said 'he wished his sons to go to college, be well educated, and his youngest to be brought up to the law.' It was because he appeared to hesitate a little when I asked him, after I had expunged his wife's name, whether he intended the residue to go equally among his children by her, that I inquired if he had any preference to make, and he said 'No; if I do, they will be jealous.' Mrs. Blewitt did not interfere during the reading of the codicil and the alterations, except in reference to the granddaughter, when she remarked 'she thought he intended to continue that allowance to her;' she seemed to have the care and anxiety of a mother, but there was no interference, no suggestion on her part whatever. I read the codicil as altered in pencil, distinctly and clearly to Major B., and asked him whether it then stood as he wished, or whether he had any other alteration to make, and he said, 'No; it was then as he wished it to be;' and afterwards he said 'that he and his wife would consider what was to be inserted as to the legacy to myself.' I was fully satisfied then that he had fully and finally made up his mind as to the alterations he intended to make in his will: indeed, I was quite satisfied in that respect the first time he spoke to me on the subject."

---

deceased should get better he would attend immediately, yet the codicil remained unprepared to the day of the deceased's death. Binns says on the 20th article, "I heard nothing from Mrs. Blewitt, and being pressed with other matters of business, I did not have the codicil copied fair for execution, nor take any steps to have it completed." Is it possible, I repeat, that Binns could have considered the draft as finally approved of and settled? His conduct contradicts such a supposition.

Again, could Mrs. Blewitt have considered the alterations finally settled? If she had so considered them, would she not, when the deceased had so much rallied, have sent for Binns who, had enjoined her so to do? And she herself must have been fully aware that the codicil was unfinished. Is not the inference, then, rather that they—both Mrs. Blewitt and Binns—considered the attempt to get a codicil executed would be abortive, and that it was vain and hopeless to proceed further. If they had made the attempt, they must have called in credible witnesses to attest the execution; and who would have been [462] satisfied, for such an act, of the deceased's volition and capacity?

But, above all, what is the legal inference from the deceased's own conduct? When he was thus much recovered from his state on the 28th—if he had a sufficiency of mind and memory left, and had really wished this great alteration of his will—he himself must have been aware that something more was to be done in order to give effect to his wishes. His very silence, therefore, raises the legal presumption that he had abandoned the instrument, and given up the intention of altering his will: his recovery afforded him, if he had desired it, an opportunity of completing the codicil; the act of God did not prevent him.

But the Court is not left upon this point to mere inference, arising from the deceased's silence and omission; for, as far as he had memory and capacity, the subject is expressly brought to his recollection. Dr. Macmichael thus answers to the 32d interrogatory: "I have no doubt the deceased was on the 5th of March as capable of making his will as at any time I had seen him, for his brain was more relieved; but, as a matter of prudence, I should have advised the postponement of any matter of business with him so soon after he had been threatened. I did on one, possibly on this identical, day, finding him so much better, say to him, 'Now, have you anything to say to me on the subject of your will, or anything in confidence as to your affairs?' or to that effect; and he answered me, 'No.'" Here, then, the deceased was expressly reminded of his will—was asked if he had anything to say on the subject of his affairs, and he answered, "No:" and this could not be from any unwillingness on his part to communi-[463]-cate with Dr. Macmichael, for he had informed him of Roberts' removal from the executorship. Dr. Macmichael further says: "He did not, on that day, make any inquiry after Mr. Binns that I recollect, nor any inquiry of me on the subject of his codicil." Coupling this with the other circumstances, and with the legal presumptions arising upon the case, it to me seems impossible to consider the instrument propounded as valid without violating all the principles of a Court of Probate.

The case being of some importance, the Court might have felt disposed, for the satisfaction of the parties, to have recapitulated rather in detail the grounds of its decision, had it not already gone pretty fully into the material parts of the evidence. It is not necessary to advert to Binns' conversation with Mr. Prothero in the Vice-Chancellor's Court, nor to declarations that the instructions for a codicil were signed, which, if I could rely upon, would disprove the identity of the instrument propounded; but the Court never relies much on evidence of mere conversations and declarations; nor shall I examine the fact of taking probate of the will, without this codicil, on the day of the deceased's death, without the knowledge of Mr. Roberts, which looks like what is termed snatching a probate; nor shall I enquire into the propriety of the oath of the widow on that occasion, as one of the surviving executors of the will—"power being reserved to Wightwick Roberts, the other executor;" though it is difficult to give any satisfactory explanation of this conduct of the widow, if there were a codicil revoking the appointment of Roberts and substituting Binns: but, without adverting further to these facts, I shall content myself with [464] again referring to the principles of law applicable to the decision of the Court: first, the strong presumption of law is always adverse to an unfinished instrument materially altering and controlling a will deliberately framed, regularly executed, recently approved, and supported by previous and uniform acts of disposition: and it is difficult to conceive a case in which that presumption would exist with more force than in the present, looking to the former wills, to the condition of the deceased, to the parties in whose favour the codicil was to be made being, at the time, about the deceased, and to the absence of other parties to whose prejudice these alterations were to operate. In such a case the fullest proof of capacity, equal not merely to some testamentary act, but to this important revocation of former dispositions and to a new direction given to a large proportion of his property, should be clearly established: and in this instance the condition of the deceased, the possession of him by the parties to be benefited, and the false impressions made upon his mind, have also a strong appearance of fraudulent circumvention, requiring the case to be proved by the most satisfactory evidence: and, lastly, when the instrument propounded is so imperfect, and in which there has been so little progress, even if it were proved that it contained at that time the mind and intention of the deceased, still it must be shewn that such intention was final, that it continued, and that he was prevented from the completion of it only by the interruption of death. In all these respects, in my judgment, the proof fails; and it is my duty to pronounce against the paper propounded as a codicil to the will.

Codicil pronounced against.

[465] CONSTABLE AND BAILEY v. TUFNELL AND MASON. Prerogative Court, Mich. Term, Caveat-Day, 1833.—A will need not originate with a testator, nor need proof be given of the commencement of such a transaction, provided it be proved that a testator completely understood, adopted, and sanctioned the disposition proposed to him, and that the instrument itself embodied such disposition.—A will—opposed on the ground of alleged incapacity, fraud, and conspiracy, and revoking a former will and codicils (which gave the residue between a sister by the half-blood and a stranger in blood), made shortly before, but under circumstances not rendering a departure improbable—pronounced for with costs; though the instructions for such latter will were not proved to have originated with the deceased; though two (out of three) of the attesting witnesses were sons of the respective executors—considerably benefited by the will, and one of which, and three other principal, witnesses were children of a niece by the whole blood—the wife of one of the executors—which niece and a sister were also largely benefited, and were immediately about the deceased—the credit of the witnesses not being shaken, and the will being sufficiently proved to have been adopted by the deceased, a free and capable testator.

James Robinson, farmer, died a bachelor, aged 76, at his house at Wormingford, Essex, on the 14th of September, 1832. On Sunday, the 27th of May, 1832, he duly executed a will, by which he appointed the Rev. George Tufnell, vicar of Wormingford, and Mr. Abram Constable, executors and residuary legatees. By a codicil executed on the same day as the will the testator, after reciting that Mr. Constable declined to act as executor, revoked his appointment and bequest, gave him a legacy of 500l., free of duty, and appointed William Mason, Esq., co-executor and residuary legatee with Mr. Tufnell. Mrs. Mason was afterwards substituted for her husband as co-residuary legatee. On the 7th of June the testator executed a second, and on the 23d of June a third, codicil—each attested by two witnesses.

The question was whether the above will and codicils were not revoked by a will executed, with all requisite formalities, on the 27th of August, 1832, and propounded on behalf of Mr. Abram Constable and the Rev. Rishton Robinson Bailey, the executors. This (last) will was opposed, on the ground that it was unduly obtained from the testator at a period when he was of unsound mind.

The King's advocate and Phillimore for Messrs. Constable and Bailey.

Lushington and Addams for Messrs. Tufnell and Mason.

[468] Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. Mr. James Robinson died on the 14th of September, 1832, at the age of 76, a bachelor, leaving three sisters of the half-blood his only next of kin, one nephew and three nieces by a deceased sister of the whole blood, entitled upon an intestacy in distribution: his property, at his death, consisted of a freehold estate valued at about 3000l., and of a personalty of 10,000l. and upwards; but the exact amount is not material to the decision of this question. A will, dated the 27th of August, 1832, has been propounded in this cause by Mr. Constable and the Rev. R. Robinson Bailey as the executors, and opposed by the Rev.

George Tufnell and William Mason, Esq., the executors under a former will, dated the 27th of May, 1832, with three codicils annexed; one dated the 27th of May—the same day as the will: another, the 7th of June; and the third, the 23d of June: and it is proper that I should consider the contents of these different testamentary instruments.

[The Court here compared them. See Comparative Abstract of the Testamentary Papers.]

The real issue of the case, as was truly stated by counsel, is whether the will of the 27th of August is proved to be the act of a capable testator. It has been propounded in what is called a common condidit, which in the usual form merely pleads the preparation and execution of the instrument and the capacity of the testator. On the condidit the attesting witnesses have been examined, and the first object to which the Court must direct its attention is their evidence. Two of these witnesses are sons of the parties, and being on that account liable to the suspicion of [469] bias, are to be heard with caution: but still they are competent; and unless their evidence in the cause be falsified, or bear with it marks of insincerity, they are credible witnesses. The third attesting witness, the solicitor who prepared the will, is a disinterested person deserving of full credit, unless, as I just observed with respect to the other two witnesses, there be something in the cause tending to falsify and discredit his evidence. Of these three witnesses the first, in point of date, who takes up the history of the transaction, is Mr. William Bailey, son of the executor: he is a great-nephew of the deceased, but has no immediate and direct interest in his effects: he describes himself, at the commencement of his deposition, as of Trinity College, Cambridge, and of the age of 22: and I proceed to state his evidence fully:—

"On or about the 18th of August last, 1832, I, then staying at my father's house at Wormingford, was in the early part of the day desired by my father to make a transcript of a paper which he handed to me: such paper was in my father's handwriting, and contained instructions for a will of the deceased. I made a copy of it, and at the desire of my father and mother I took the copy to the deceased, who resided at two miles' distance or thereabouts from my father's house. I reached the deceased's house at about the middle of the same day, probably at between the hours of one and two: I found the deceased sitting in his parlour, and my mother and Mr. Abram Constable in conversation with him. I, on recollection, cannot be certain whether it was on the same day that I copied the said paper that I carried it to the deceased; it may have been a day or two after I [470] had so copied it. When I so entered the room the deceased was conversing on the subject of his then last will (that is, the will of May), and I joined in the conversation; I asked the deceased whether it was not a pity to sell his farm, meaning the estate on which he was then residing (viz. at Wormingford): I asked that question, knowing that in his then last will such estate was directed to be disposed of: the deceased replied, 'I never wished that it should be sold, but we must sell it, to divide the money alike.' I then said that that might be done without selling the farm, for that if it was left to Judith Rolfe's four children, they might agree among themselves how it should be divided: the deceased in further answer said, 'Let it be so.' I then reminded the deceased that 'by Mr. Tufnell's will' he had left 1000l. to the school which Mr. Tufnell had established in the deceased's parish, and suggested that he had better in lieu thereof leave the sum of 500l. for the benefit of the poor. The deceased replied, 'I should wish it to be so, but how can it be done? there is nothing handy.' My mother then said, 'There is William who has got a paper of instructions which he will read to you.' The deceased replied, 'Let us hear it.' I then produced the paper which I had copied as already mentioned, and read it to the deceased; and having done so, I pointed out to him that the only alterations which such instructions contained, as from the disposition made by his last will, were in regard to the sale of his estate, and the substitution of a legacy of 500l. to the poor instead of 1000l. to Mr. Tufnell's school, and of 20l. to Mr. Tufnell's clerk, instead of the sum of 200l. I asked the deceased whether he wished these alterations to [471] be made in his will: the deceased answered 'Yes.' I then asked the deceased who he wished to have for his executors: he said that he had all his life wished Mr. Constable to be his executor; and Mr. Constable observed that he was willing to act as an executor with Mr. Bailey, but not with Mr. Tufnell; upon which the deceased begged Mr. Constable to see to

WILL (a draft will), dated 27th May, 1832.	WILL (propounded), dated 27th August, 1832.	WILL, prepared on 8th or 9th of August, 1832, but not executed.
EXECUTORS AND UNIVERSAL LEGATEES, IN TRUST, REV. GEORGE TUFNELL, and Mr. ABRAM CONSTABLE.(a)	EXECUTORS AND RESIDUARY LEGATEES, IN TRUST, REV. R. R. BAILEY, ABRAM CONSTABLE.	EXECUTORS, R. R. BAILEY, JAMES DANIELL.
Testator directs his real estate at Wormingford, with the tithes, &c., and all his personal estate, to be converted into money. Also that his executors, in compliance with Deed executed by him on 9th Feb. 1832, should invest a sum sufficient to produce £35 per annum for charitable uses; and a further sum sufficient to produce the following Annuities, viz.	Executors to convert into money his personal Estate, and to pay Legacies at the end of 12 months after his decease.(b) To invest £500 in their names, and apply interest to use of the deserving Poor of Wormingford,(c) as the trustees for the time being and Vicar of Wormingford shall think fit:— To invest a sum sufficient to produce £50 per annum, and thereout to pay, during the lives of Annuitants—	Same. Executors to invest £300 in the names of R. R. Bailey and A. Constable, in trust to apply dividends for use of the deserving Poor of Wormingford, at the discretion of Trustees.
Abi Elliott, his late housekeeper . . . £25 Mary Hayward (servant) . . . . 20 Mrs. Crabbe 10	A. Elliott . . . . . £20 M. Hayward . . . . . 20 M. Crabbe 10	A. Elliott . . . . . £40 M. Howard . . . . per annum 12
As the Annuitants die, the portions of the principal to revert to his personal estate.
Wm. Rolfe, M.D. (nephew) . . . . £1000 Mrs. Bailey, Anne Rolfe, Mrs. Chase (nieces) . . . . 1000 each	Wm. Rolfe . . also, all his freehold estates at Wormingford, as tenants in common, and residue as below. £1000 Mrs. Bailey . . 1000 Anne Rolfe . . 1000 Mrs. Chase . . 1000 Abram Constable (d) 500	W. Rolfe . His freehold house at Wormingford, occupied by Scott. Anne Rolfe, Mrs. Chase . His freehold estate at Wormingford, in his own occupation, as tenants in common. A. Constable £50
Child of W. Rolfe . . . . . 300 (If more than one, £400 among them.) Children of Mrs. Bailey . . . . 400 of Mrs. Chase 400
Mrs. George Nottidge, Mrs. Wm. Mason, Mrs. George Sadler (sisters) . . . . 800 each	Mrs. Nottidge, Mrs. Mason, Mrs. Sadler (sisters) . . . . 1000 each	Mrs. Nottidge . . . . . 100 Mrs. Mason . . . . . 100 Mrs. Sadler 100

[467]

Three Sisters' Children { £200, 200, 200 } . . . 600

Legacies to be paid within 12 months after his death.

Legacies and Annuities to be free from Legacy Duty; the legacies to his Sisters, Nephew and Nieces, in case of death, to vest in the Children of each.

Rev. W. Tufnell (part of debt of £1700). . £700 he to account for remainder.

John Sidey Constable £500

Both last legacies to be paid within 12 months, free from legacy duty.

RESIDUE.

Rev. George Tufnell and Abram Constable—they accounting for what they owe deceased.

If any Legatee contests will, his legacy to be void, and to go into residue.

(a) The italics denote a revocation by codicil.

J. S. Constable 100

Spellen Grimwood 20

RESIDUE.

Harriett Bailey.
Abram Constable.
Anne Rolfe.
Mrs. Chase.
Wm. Rolfe, M.D.

(b) In the instructions, and in the will at first—6 months.
(c) In the instructions—"charitable purposes."
(d) "My friend the said Abram Constable" was interlined.

Grimwood 20
John Brown 5

RESIDUE.

Anne Rolfe.
Mrs. Chase.
Wm. Rolfe, M.D.

1st Codicil, 27th May, 1832.

In consequence of Abram Constable declining to act as executor, his appointment as such and share in residue revoked; and gives him, free from duty £500

Appoints executor and residuary legatee with George Tufnell, William Mason, he forfeiting his right to the legacy of £800, and to share only in residue.

2d Codicil, 7th June, 1832.

All the legacies to be subject to, but the Annuities to remain free from, duty.

To Spellen Grimwood (servant)—to be applied at the discretion of the executors . . . £200

Revokes legacy of £700 to W. Tufnell.

Revokes appointment of W. Mason as residuary legatee.

Gives residue to said G. Tufnell, as in Will, and Anne Mason, wife of said W. Mason.

Revokes legacy to Mrs. Mason, of £800, by Will.

Continues W. Mason as executor.

3d Codicil, 23d June, 1832.

Revokes legacy of £500 to J. S. Constable, in consideration of money he has received, and in lieu gives him £100 the ordering of it, meaning that it was his wish that Mr. Constable should cause a will to be drawn up conformable to such instructions. I then delivered the said paper, which I had read over to the deceased, to him, saying, I will leave the paper with you, sir, for a few days, that you may think of it: the deceased replied, 'Aye, I like to have a few hours to turn a thing over in my mind.' Mr. Constable got up to take his leave of the deceased, who said to him, 'Are you going, when will you come again, and finish what we have begun?' Mr. Constable said that he would see him again in a few days. I, upon this, observed to the deceased that there was plenty of time yet. Mr. Constable then came away, and I accompanied him, leaving my mother with the deceased.

"On the following day I again went over to the deceased's house and found him in his parlour, and my mother sitting with him: I asked the deceased whether he had thought of the alterations which we had talked over on the preceding day: the deceased said in answer that he considered them (the alterations) to be very fair, and the sooner they were done the better."

This is a pretty direct approval of the instructions, which appear to have been perfectly understood, and a clear expression of his anxiety to have them completed.

[472] "I told him there was plenty of time, and that my father and Mr. Constable were both out of the way and would not be back for several days. I well recollect that on that occasion the paper of instructions copied by me as aforesaid was produced, and I believe that my mother took it out of the deceased's bureau, which was in the room in which he was sitting. I do not recollect that the paper was more immediately referred to than by my offering to read it to him again, which I did not do, because he said, 'I heard it yesterday.'"

Therefore, provided this account be true, the deceased had a recollection of what had passed on the day before. "On Sunday, the 26th of August last, my aunt, Miss Rolfe, told me that her uncle, the deceased, wished to execute his will on the next day, and desired me to go over to him on the following morning to fetch the paper of instructions which had been left with him, and then carry the same to Mr. Daniell, a solicitor in Head-street, Colchester [about six miles from Wormingford], and I undertook to do so. In the morning of the 27th of August I went over to the deceased's house, arriving there at about ten o'clock: I did not see the deceased; he was still in bed."

The witness (after stating that he carried the instructions to Colchester to Mr. Daniell, who drew out the will, and that they returned together to Wormingford, reaching the deceased's house at about three) thus goes on: "We found Mr. Constable standing outside the deceased's house, with his son John. Mr. Daniell then, accompanied by myself, my brother Rishton, Mr. Constable, and his son, went into a room on the ground floor, divided by a passage from that in which the deceased was sitting. Daniell then read the will, which he had so prepared, to Mr. Con-[473]-stable, and while he was in the act of reading, my aunt, Miss Rolfe, came into the room, and told Daniell that Constable was not satisfied, on account of his not having an equal share in the farm with the children of Judith Rolfe. Mr. Daniell said that there could be nothing done on that subject unless Mr. Bailey (my father) was there, and the deceased agreed to it. Miss Rolfe replied, that as Mr. Bailey had no interest in the will, it could make no difference whether he was there or not. Mr. Daniell said that he could have no objection to insert the name of Mr. Constable as a party to be entitled to a share of the estate (the deceased's farm), provided the other parties agreed, and the deceased sanctioned it; and Mr. Daniell begged my aunt to consult the deceased on the subject. Miss Rolfe left the room, and went, as I believe, to the deceased, and in a few minutes after she returned, telling Mr. Daniell that the deceased had given his full concurrence to the insertion of the name of Mr. Constable as a joint devisee of his real property, and Mr. Daniell thereupon made an alteration in the will to that effect. Miss Rolfe again came into the room, and said that the deceased was ready, and Mr. Daniell, myself, Mr. Constable, his son, and Miss Rolfe went into the deceased's room, where he was sitting. I forget whether my mother was there with him; if she was with him she left the room upon our entering it. My mother was at the deceased's house at the time. Upon entering the room I asked the deceased how he was; he answered, 'Very sadly,' and complained that his hands were very much swelled. I said, 'Why, uncle, you have not got your spectacles on, you can't sign your will without.' The deceased answered, 'No, I can do [474] nothing without them.' Miss Rolfe then got the deceased's spectacles. I introduced Mr. Daniell to the deceased, saying, 'Here is Mr. Daniell, of Colchester, come to see the will signed.' The deceased, who was not previously acquainted with Mr. Daniell, said to him, 'How do you do, sir?' Mr. Daniell made some observation to the deceased about having met him some ten years ago; and he introduced the business he had come about by telling the deceased that he would read the will to him. Mr. Daniell then commenced reading the will, and read it through. The deceased stopped him once or twice in the course of the reading, particularly at hearing the legacy of 1000l. to Mrs. Nottidge read, saying, 'How is that?'"

It is not surprising that the deceased should stop Mr. Daniell at this point, because there is a difference in the legacy to Mrs. Nottidge between the will of May and the will then being read. In the will of May Mrs. Nottidge has a legacy of 800l. only, and her children 200l.; substantially therefore the benefit may be considered as the same under both wills, but the sum of 1000l. to Mrs. Nottidge probably at the time struck the deceased's ear, and induced him to say, "How is that?" "Mr. Daniell again read over such legacy, which the deceased then approved of, I saying that such legacy was of the same amount in Mr. Tufnell's will, meaning the will which the deceased had then last executed. I also recollect that when Mr. Daniell had read over the annuities, the deceased stopped him, asking whether they 'did not amount to too much?' to which Mr. Daniell replied that the same made together just 50l. a year." That is, 20l. a year to Mrs. Elliott, 20l. a year to Hayward, and 10l. to Mrs. Crabbe [475]—the same bequests as in the will of May, except that Elliott, under that will, has an annuity of 25l.

"With this explanation (of Mr. Daniell) the deceased was satisfied. When the will had been read, the deceased said, 'It appears very fair for all parties.' Mr. Daniell then pointed out to the deceased the place where he was to sign his name on the will, the deceased saying that he hardly knew whether he should be able to do it on account of his hands being so swelled. Miss Rolfe handed a pen to the deceased, and he then, in the presence of Mr. Daniell, Mr. John Constable, and myself, signed his name to the will which had been so read to him, Miss Rolfe and Mr. Abram Constable being the only other persons present. It was at the suggestion of Mr. Daniell that I and Mr. John Constable attended the execution of the said will. The deceased, by the direction of Mr. Daniell, put his finger on the seal attached to the will, and according to a form of words, which Mr. Daniell dictated, he declared the paper so signed by him to be his last will. When this had been done, I and Mr. John Constable and Mr. Daniell signed our names as witnesses to the execution of the said will, in the presence of the deceased and of each other, and also set our initials against the alteration made in respect of the insertion of the name of Mr. Constable, and also to another alteration which had been made previous to our going into the deceased's room, substituting the time of twelve months instead of six months for the payment of legacies. When the execution of the will was completed, Mr. Daniell said to the deceased, 'I hope, sir, that you are better now?' the deceased answered, 'Yes, sir, I feel better here,' at the same time laying his hand upon his heart. [476] Mr. Daniell also asked the deceased who he wished to take charge of the will, for that it might be done in three ways; that sometimes the executors, and sometimes the lawyer, took it, and sometimes the testator kept it himself. The deceased in reply said that Mr. Constable was as proper as any one to take it, and the deceased then himself handed the will to Abram Constable, and asked him if he was satisfied, adding, 'Now is the time to speak.' Mr. Constable answered, 'Nothing can be fairer.' They then retired into the room which we had occupied previous to attending the execution of the will, leaving me alone with the deceased." The witness then deposes that, on each of the occasions of his having with the deceased the communications already set forth, "the deceased was of sound, perfect, and disposing mind, memory, and understanding; and in every respect a capable testator."

It is manifest that this account does not furnish the origin of the testamentary instructions, for something may have passed, or be inferred to have passed, between the Rev. Mr. Bailey and the deceased before the paper which the witness was thus desired by his father to transcribe was written; but of any conversation or preparatory communication, in respect to such instructions, there is no direct evidence, as the executor—the person with whom it passed—cannot be examined. It is also obvious that the deceased, Mrs. Bailey, and Mr. Abram Constable were, on, and before, the entrance of Mr. William Bailey, the witness, in conversation together about a will, and the disposition of particular parts of the property; but the Court is not otherwise acquainted with the nature of their conversation, so that it has neither [477] the origin of the instructions nor the beginning of this conversation in evidence: but neither are absolutely necessary, provided what is proved be sufficient to shew that the testator was capable, and that his mind and testamentary disposition went with the transaction in the manner related. It is no part of the testamentary law of this country that the making a will must originate with a testator, nor is it required that proof should be given of the commencement of such a transaction, provided, I repeat, it be proved that the deceased completely understood, adopted, and sanctioned the disposition proposed to him, and that the instrument itself embodied such disposition.

Now if the account here given by this witness be quite correct and true—if every thing passed in the way he has deposed, the case admits of but little doubt: he, however, is only one witness, and necessarily open to the suspicion of bias; and the persons about the deceased were all interested; Mrs. Bailey, the mother of the witness, who was a niece of the deceased, is a legatee, and one of the residuary legatees under this will; and Mr. Constable, one of the executors, has a legacy, and is also a joint residuary legatee; these were persons, therefore, interested in obtaining this will.

The next witness is Mr. John Constable, the son of the other executor, and he is, therefore, exposed to the same imputation of bias as the witness whose evidence I have read. He describes himself as a young farmer, twenty-five years of age; he knows nothing of the origin of this transaction—it was by mere accident that he became an attesting witness, and was only present at the execution: but his account of what passed at the execution is to the same effect as Mr. William [478] Bailey's, and so far he confirms and corroborates the testimony of that witness. The remaining attesting witness is Mr. Edward Daniell, a witness of more importance; he is the solicitor who prepared the will, attended the execution, and attested it: he is not exposed, like the other two attesting witnesses, to an imputation of bias from personal favour, but, a priori, stands above all exception before the Court. He confirms Mr. W. Bailey's account as to the instructions for the will being brought to him at Colchester—the preparation of the instrument—and their return together to Wormingford: he also gives a similar account to that witness of what occurred upon their arrival at the deceased's house. Mr. Edward Daniell then proceeds in his evidence as follows:—

"We were, on arriving, shewn into a small room on the right hand of the entrance passage, being a room opposite to that in which I afterwards found the deceased. Miss Rolfe (till then unknown to me) came in, as also did Mr. Abram Constable, with whom I was acquainted. The two Baileys were in and out of the room. There then arose some conversation in respect of the contents of the will which I had brought with me. I quite forget how precisely that conversation commenced, but Mr. Constable inquired of me in what manner the deceased's real estate was disposed of, saying, 'Mr. Robinson always said that I should take an equal part with the rest.' I am not quite sure whether I read over the will to him and Miss Rolfe, but I at any rate fully explained to them the manner in which the estate was devised, upon which Mr. Constable said that 'he would have nothing to do with the business, unless Mr. Robinson did as he promised to do:' or he expressed [479] himself to that effect.(a)

(a) Annexed to Mr. Tufnell's and Mr. Mason's allegation was this letter addressed to the deceased:—

Dedham, May 29, 1832.

Dear Sir,—I have seen Mr. Mason this morning, and I find his name is put instead of mine as executor, and, as I said, I think a very proper person. I find Mr. G. Tufnell has made a codicil to the will he made for you (wherein you are pleased to give me £500).

Now, I wish Mr. Tufnell to dispose of my legacy in any way he thinks proper, for he said as much at Mason's office that my brother Sidey might thank him for his legacy, and I am very sure he will say the same by me; therefore I will not accept it through his hands. I can't say but I feel mortified and hurt very much, as you always gave me reason to think you would make me equal with the rest, and have told me as much Upon this Miss Rolfe said, 'Then I'll take the will to Mr. Robinson, and talk to him about it;' and she left the room carrying the will with her. In five or six minutes Miss Rolfe returned with the will, saying that Mr. Robinson was agreeable that Mr. Constable should share the real estate with the rest, and I then interlined the name of Mr. Abram Constable as one of the devisees in the said will."

Here was nothing unnatural in this, as bearing on the validity of the will. Whether Mr. Constable acted with delicacy and disinterestedness—whether his conduct was wise or weak—whether he was actuated by self-interest in any part of the business—is not a point upon which it is necessary for the Court to come to any decision: the validity of the will does not depend upon his conduct in this respect: he was a very old friend and near relation—a first cousin by the whole blood—and much in the [480] confidence and kindness of the deceased; and the acquiescence and consent of the deceased to the introduction of Mr. Constable's name into the devise of the freehold comes through hands not liable to suspicion: for Miss Rolfe was acting in this matter in opposition to her own interest; for she would take only one-fifth, instead of one-fourth, of the real estate, and the very circumstance of previously consulting the deceased shews that he was considered and treated as a capable person.

The will being thus in readiness for execution, the persons assembled (Mr. Daniell, Abram Constable and his son, Miss Rolfe, and the two young Baileys) went into the deceased's room. It appears from another part of the evidence that the deceased was impatient for the execution, and this was natural enough if he had made the appointment for it, and expected it. It was also natural that having been kept waiting should, in his state of bodily weakness, increase his impatience. Two other witnesses, quite unbiassed, had, it is stated, been sent for to attest the execution; these were Mr. Symmons, a medical gentleman, and Scott, a smith residing in the neighbourhood and well acquainted with the deceased; but as they did not arrive, these two young men—Mr. William Bailey and John Constable—were desired to attest the execution. When Mr. Daniell and the other persons entered the room they found the deceased—not in bed, but sitting up in his chair—labouring under dropsy and gout, with his hand very much swelled; so that his bodily powers were weakened: his disorder, however, was not of that sort, nor in such a part, as would affect his intellects.

But to proceed with Mr. Daniell's evidence; he thus deposes to the execution: "On enter-[481]-ing the deceased's room I addressed him saying, 'How do ye do, sir?' his answer was, 'Oh, sadly, sir.' I then said, 'I have brought the will over.' I do not remember that he, by word, gave any reply, but he assented by bowing his head. The deceased enquired, 'Is Mr. Mason come?' or 'Is Mr. Mason coming?' Miss Rolfe in answer said, 'No sir, we sent for Mr. Daniell;' and it was suggested to the deceased, I believe by Miss Rolfe, that it was more proper that I, being a stranger, should be employed, than Mr. Mason, or to that effect, to which the deceased assented, but in the midst of the conversation which took place between Miss Rolfe and Mr. Constable I did not distinctly hear what the deceased said. I then said to the deceased, 'I will read the will over to you, if you please.' A chair was placed for me close to the deceased, and having therein seated myself, I commenced reading the will audibly and slowly, asking him after I had proceeded a little way whether he heard me, to which he replied that he did. I do not recollect that the deceased made any observation until I came to the bequest for the benefit of the poor of the parish of Wormingford, when hearing its amount he said, 'That will be giving too much, won't it?' I fancied at the moment that he might have misunderstood me, and I explained the amount and nature of the bequest; that is to say, I clearly pointed out to him that the interest only and not the amount of the capital sum was yearly to be applied: with this explanation he was satisfied, as if agreeable to his intention, but he did not say that he had misunderstood me. I then proceeded in and completed the reading of the will in the same slow and audible [482] manner, and having so done, I said to the deceased, 'Is it right, sir?' or something to that effect: the deceased, who spoke but little, and then in a low tone, assented, I believe, more by a motion of the head than by any words; but I was quite satisfied that he had understood and did approve of what had been read to him."

---

a hundred times; but I know the will [of 27th May] is not of your own making, therefore I am obliged for your good intentions toward me, and I sincerely hope, when you leave this troublesome world, you may go to one where you may be for ever happy. (Signed) ABRAM CONSTABLE.

"We then made preparations for the execution of the will. I said, 'Now, sir, you will be so good as to sign:' and observing that the table was rather low, I proposed that a book should be laid on it for him to sign upon. A book being procured, I laid it on the table, and on the book disposed the will conveniently for his signature. By this time the deceased, apparently through weakness of body or fatigue, appeared indisposed to take up the pen, which was placed with the ink ready for him, saying, 'My neck aches so; I'll do it presently.' Miss Rolfe said to him, 'Take a glass of wine, sir; you'll be better presently.' A glass of sherry was brought to him and he drank it, and in a few minutes became better and desirous of signing, but he then discovered that he wanted his spectacles. Miss Rolfe handed him his spectacles, and the deceased of his own accord (I placing his arm and hand, the latter being very much swelled, in a convenient position) signed his name at the foot of the said will, I telling him so to do opposite the seal. I then placed a seal appended to my watch upon the wax impression already affixed to the will, and desired the deceased to take the seal off, which he did; he then, at my desire, took hold of the will, and while he held it I said to him, 'You sign, seal, publish, and declare this to be and contain your last will and testament. You have heard it read, you ap-[483]-prove its contents, and you desire me, Mr. Constable, junior, and Mr. Bailey, junior, to be witnesses?' to which the deceased signified his assent, either saying 'Yes,' in a low tone, or by bowing his head. We, the subscribing witnesses (myself, W. Bailey, and John Constable), in the presence of the deceased and of each other, then attested the execution of the will by signing our names."

"The will being now complete, I, in consequence of not having received my instructions for it from the deceased himself, yet not at all doubting the entire competency of the deceased, thought it necessary to proceed beyond the usual caution observed by me in ordinary cases; and at the risk of being considered too particular by the relatives of the deceased, who were around him (that idea suggesting itself at the time), I accordingly said to the deceased, 'Now, Mr. Robinson, you perfectly understand what you have been doing? You have given your real property to so and so' (naming the several devisees as they were named in the will), 'you have also given your personal property to so and so' (naming the persons legatees in the will), 'and you have appointed Mr. Bailey and Mr. Constable your executors; does this perfectly correspond with your meaning?' The deceased replied, rather addressing those about him than myself, 'Are you all satisfied? because if any alteration is to be made, now is the time.'" [This is the testator's own observation and answer to Mr. Daniell's inquiry.] "Mr. Abram Constable said, 'Yes, sir, we are all satisfied, it is quite right, sir;' and Miss Rolfe also expressed herself to the same effect. I then folded the will up, and said to the deceased, 'Who do you wish to have the custody of this [484] will?' He asked, 'What was usual?' I said, 'Sometimes the testator keeps it, sometimes the executor takes it, and sometimes it is left with the solicitor; now you can do as you please.' The deceased in reply said, 'I wish Mr. Constable to have it, if you think he is a proper person;' my answer was, 'No one more so, either as a man of business or a gentleman.' The deceased, to the best of my recollection, himself then handed the will so executed to Mr. Abram Constable. I recollect that it was said by some one, 'I hope, sir, you feel better now?' The deceased answered, 'I am better already, I'm better here,' at the same time placing his hand on his breast. In a few minutes after this I went out of the room."

This witness also speaks to the perfect capacity of the deceased.(a)

(a) He further deposed that (after the execution) Mr. Symmons came and asked deceased "how he did." "Sadly, sir;" that Symmons went on saying—"They tell me you have been making your will:" but that witness did not hear deceased's answer; and quitted the room. Mr. Symmons (a surgeon, aged 33) deposed: "I never was in Mr. Robinson's company but twice in my life; once was on the 27th of August last; I went to his house in consequence of a message delivered at my house, desiring me to go to his house immediately; I was not aware of the purpose for which I was wanted; I was not told I was too late for any purpose: Mr. Constable, whom I had known for some years, informed me upon my arrival that Mr. Robinson had just executed his will, and that I might as well step in and see him, to speak to the state he was in; I said I could have no objection to see Mr. Robinson, and went into the room in which he was, and entered into conversation (though a very short one)

[485] This is the substance of the evidence given by the attesting witnesses upon the condidit; and though there may exist between this last witness and Mr. William Bailey some difference in their respective statements, as will generally, if not always, be the case with honest witnesses, yet they concur in the most material points. If this evidence upon the condidit be delivered, there is an end of the case.

Whether the will originated with the deceased, or was suggested to him, yet if he (possessed of testamentary capacity to understand and comprehend) adopted and approved of it, and was resolved and decided so to dispose of his property, the will must be pronounced for: for it is not necessary, as I have before observed, that the Court should have before it the very origin of the whole transaction; nor that it should be satisfied that the will originated with the deceased himself; it may have been suggested by the persons around him: but if importunity is to vitiate the instrument, the importunity must be proved; and proved to be of such a nature and degree that the deceased was unable to resist it—that his free-will and free-agency were destroyed, and that he acquiesced only for peace: but the mere circumstance of his being, at the time of the preparation and execution of the will, surrounded by interested persons, provided, I again repeat, that the deceased himself were competent, and that he gave his sanction to the instrument pro-[486]-posed to him, will not make such instrument null and void: now here the evidence, if it be not utterly discredited, proves intention, execution, and capacity.

The case set up in opposition to this will, both in plea and in argument, takes pretty much the view of the subject that I have pointed out: for it is attempted to be maintained that the whole is fraud, imposition, conspiracy, and perjury. Who then are the conspirators? Mr. and Mrs. Bailey, their two sons and two daughters (who have been examined in the cause)—Miss Rolfe—Mr. Constable and his son—and the solicitor, Mr. Daniell, for he must also be included. Here then are ten persons—a pretty numerous body—combining as actors in this conspiracy.

When fraud, conspiracy, and perjury are imputed, the imputation must be supported by strong facts and clear evidence; it is not to be maintained upon slight variations between the witnesses as to times, and dates, and trivial circumstances, nor upon conflicting opinions as to capacity. No case occurs in which such variations may not be picked out, and such differences of opinion extracted. It does not, therefore, seem a matter of duty cast upon the Court to discuss minutely all the different parts of the evidence in this cause: the grounds of opposition have been very strenuously and elaborately argued; and whatever impressions those arguments were calculated to make upon the mind of the Court as to particular points, they were for the most part answered and removed by a very able reply. But referring again to the main ground—the evidence upon the condidit—on which the will of the 27th of August rests, I cannot find any thing that materially, or [487] at all, shakes the force of that evidence. It will then be sufficient for me to notice very briefly the general outline of the grounds of opposition.

The making of the will of the 27th of May, followed up by two codicils in June, was mainly relied upon, as rendering it highly improbable that a different disposition would so soon afterwards be adopted. Upon that will—the disposition of the property that it contains—the mode of its preparation and execution, I shall forbear to observe further than that it was not made under circumstances which rendered a departure from it extremely improbable. It was the deceased's first testamentary act; it was not preceded by a series of former wills to the same tenor and effect, and establishing any very fixed character in respect to the disposition of his property; it has many of the same marks of infirmity which are imputed to the latter will; and it is not satisfactorily proved that the will itself had its origin with the deceased, nor that the disposition it contained proceeded entirely from him; this, I think, is not even prewith him; I do not think I was with him ten minutes altogether; my questions to him were common-place, and his answers were correct to them, but there was nothing to try the strength of his mind; my questions regarded his health, his ability to walk out, and the weather; and he answered me those questions correctly; I said to him that I understood that he had just executed his will, and he answered me, as I thought, rather sharply, as if he thought my observation rather impertinent, 'Yes, sir; have you any objection?' I did not consider his manner joking; I have no opinion at all to give as to the state of his mind; I had not the means of judging."

---

tended. Mr. Mason (the husband of a half-sister of the deceased), the drawer of that will, had no communication himself upon it with the deceased; he received his instructions from Mr. Tufnell—a party interested, and one of the executors and residuary legatees; he was not at the execution, and never saw the deceased on the business. The will is executed at rather a strange time (on a Sunday evening), through the intervention and in the presence of the same executor. A considerable benefit is given to this executor—(a total stranger in blood, though, being the incumbent of Wormingford, the deceased was acquainted with him)—and also to his brother, who was rather a [488] large bond debtor to the deceased. Such a disposition of property—so made—does not appear to me, without entering into any further observations upon the instrument itself, or upon its preparation and execution, to carry a strong inference that this will of May would not, under an alteration of circumstances, be departed from.

The next ground set up is that the deceased's capacity had wholly changed; that in the latter part of July he became incapable, or at least much worse in mental as well as bodily health; and that while in that debilitated state his niece, Mrs. Bailey, and her family, and also Miss Rolfe—another niece—obtruded themselves into the deceased's house—took up their residence in it—obtained the possession—almost the custody of the deceased, and by undue influence and false suggestions procured this new will—containing, however, a disposition not very widely different from the will of May, except in respect to the residue and the executorship.

Upon the question of general capacity, as very frequently happens—perhaps in every case—there are conflicting opinions; and in such opinions each set of witnesses are apt to go a little beyond the exact and correct state and condition of the party; the opinions on one side making the capacity too good, and on the other side too bad. But the opinion of Spellen Grimwood and Mary Hayward (two of the deceased's servants), and other such witnesses, cannot have any great effect, because their opinion is opposed to the facts and circumstances proved in the cause. Conversations, acts of business, attendance upon private family worship—in all of which the deceased engaged—are established, and yet both Grimwood and Mary Hayward venture to depose to his incapacity, and [489] particularly that on the 27th of August, the very day of the execution of this will, "the deceased was quite childish;" these are the very words of their deposition on the 27th article. This description is inconsistent with the evidence on the condidit: both cannot be quite true; and unless I find that the latter is so affected by other testimony as to be unworthy of credit, I shall consider the evidence of the attesting witnesses as more entitled to the confidence of the Court than that of Grimwood and Hayward.

That a person of the deceased's time of life at the period in question—labouring under such infirmities—addicted to habits of intemperance—might occasionally exhibit lapses of memory, and even symptoms of some wandering, may easily be imagined; but this cannot weigh against his conduct, and against all the circumstances and considerations detailed in the evidence, and to some of which I have just cursorily referred. That conduct and those circumstances and considerations leave no doubt on my mind that his general capacity was quite adequate to give effect to a new disposition of his property: and, moreover, he lived and went about for a fortnight after the new will was executed.

It was not attempted, even in argument, to maintain a total want of testamentary capacity: but it was inferred that if the deceased shewed signs of some torpor in the months of May and June, he was probably much worse in July and August; but such an inference is considerably weakened, if not extinguished, by the difference of his habits at the two periods: in the former months he was indulging in habits of intemperance—often drinking strong liquors to a late hour at night, and lying in bed to a late hour on the fol-[490]-lowing day. Even Spellen Grimwood makes large admissions on this point. In answer to the ninth interrogatory he says:

"The deceased's chief drink during the last twelvemonth of his life was 'purl;' he sometimes, if a friend came in, drank a glass of wine, sometimes a little gin. I have seen him when he has drunk too much; it happened rather more frequently than I wished. I never took any particular account of how often he got drunk; it may have happened once a week; he went on in this way till the latter end of July last; he sometimes, when he had drunk too much, sat up at night till twelve or one o'clock; I always sat up with him on those occasions; I used to have a glass with him sometimes. Scott, the blacksmith, when he has come up about work, used to stay at the deceased's invitation and drink a glass or two with him; he also sometimes used to call in one of his farming men and give him a glass. Clarke, the shoemaker, formerly used to sit and drink a glass with the deceased, but I don't recollect that he did so within the last twelvemonth. Brown is the farming man. I never heard what advice was given by the deceased's medical attendants; but when the Baileys came to the deceased's house, the deceased was kept, as I thought, too low; he was not allowed so much drink as he had been previously accustomed to: I don't know that I ever saw him intoxicated after that Mrs. Bailey and her family came there. I account for that in this way, namely, that his mind was no longer what it was; for neither Mrs. Bailey nor any one else could have persuaded him to leave off drink when he was himself, for 'then he had great resolution, and would have his own way.'"

[491] The witness may account for it in that manner, but it does not follow that his conclusion is correct: however he admits that, after Mrs. Bailey came, the deceased was restrained, and no longer indulged in these habits of intoxication. On the tenth interrogatory he further says: "When the deceased had got a little liquor in his head he was apt to be abusive, he then spared no one, 'gentle or simple,' 'twas all one to him." Mary Hayward, also, upon these interrogatories, speaks much to the same effect: and the correctness of their statements on this point is in some degree confirmed by four bills for liquor, supplied to the deceased, which are annexed to the interrogatories. In February, 1832, there is a bill for 12l. 2s. 4d.; in April, for 12l. 5s. 8d.; in June, for 12l. 14s.; and in July the amount is reduced to 2l. 11s.

It was in July that Mrs. Bailey and her family went to reside at the deceased's house, and from that time his habits of intemperance greatly diminished; and the probability is that although it might be necessary for him to have recourse to some degree of support from cordials, yet he refrained from the excessive use of his favourite "purl." I see no reason, therefore, to infer that his mental faculties were more impaired, or that his liability to be imposed upon was greater, or that he was in these respects in a worse state in the months of July and August than in those of May and June: the reverse seems to me rather the just inference.

There is, however, an important fact pleaded in opposition to the will, namely, that Mrs. Bailey and her family almost forced themselves into the deceased's residence —took the possession and management of his house, and had a complete influ-[492]-ence over the deceased in the state of incapacity to which he was then reduced. The fifteenth article of the opposing allegation pleads: "That Miss Rolfe and Mrs. Bailey, together with her two sons and two daughters, on the 28th of July, 1832, took up their residence at his house, although the Rev. R. Bailey, who from such time was very frequently backwards and forwards at the testator's, had a house two miles distant: that they so took up their residence, and continued to reside at the testator's until after his death, without any previous intimation, and wholly uninvited by the testator; that the testator was not partial to any or either of such persons; that he never before had invited them to spend, and they never had spent, a night at his house; and that he entertained the worst opinion of Mr. Bailey, and uniformly spoke of him in terms of strong dislike and reprobation."

The nineteenth article is to this effect: "That his mental faculties began visibly to decline from the commencement of July, 1832, that such decline rapidly increased from the beginning of August, and the faculties of the testator became, and ever after continued to be, decidedly deranged and impaired; that from the beginning of July, and especially after the beginning of August, his conversation became wandering and incoherent, his memory lost and defective, and that he almost constantly confused times, persons, and places." After pleading various delusions it alleged "that during the whole period aforesaid he was of unsound mind." (a)

(a) On this article Mr. Harrold, of Great Horsley, surgeon, aged 68, deposed: "I had been in the habit of attending the late Mr. Robinson, of Wormingford, for many years. I visited him from June last until his death, and for the last two months of his life, about twice a-week on an average. During the whole of the two last months of my aforesaid attendance I observed a very material failure in his memory with respect to recent occurrences, which, more particularly during the latter part of his life, and throughout August last, increased, so as to reduce the deceased to a state of considerable mental imbecility; in which condition he frequently mistook facts, [493] Now this alleged custody and assumption of authority is a most important feature in the cause; [494] if true, they would lay a foundation for, and give a colour to, all the subsequent transac-[495]-tions. If Mrs. Bailey and her family did take possession of this gentleman in his debilitated state, and if their conduct was such as is here represented, it would create the greatest suspicion against any act obtained from him, departing from the will of May, and changing in their favour the disposition of his property: but, on the other hand, if the deceased, sensible of his growing infirmities, and of the state of domestic misrule that prevailed under his roof, had himself invited Mrs. Bailey to come to his house, this would of itself lead to a new and different testamentary disposition of his property, and strongly indicate that it was his own act.

I have already noticed the deceased's habits of intemperance; he would indulge in drinking strong liquors with any persons who would join his revelries, and, among others, with the witness, Spellen Grimwood, as he himself admits. This Grimwood was the clerk of Mr. Tufnell's parish, and was brought, after service on a Sunday evening, to attest the former will—of which Mr. Tufnell is an executor; he is a legatee—not [496] in the will, but in the codicil of the 7th of June—in no less a sum than 200l.; he was a sort of spy, to give information to Mr. Tufnell of what passed in the deceased's house, and was in the habit of making memoranda for that purpose; and he is a very forward and leading witness in opposition to the will propounded in this cause. The other person, Mary Hayward, had lived as the deceased's housekeeper for ten or eleven years, and had the chief management of his house while these intemperate habits were indulged: she is a fellow witness with Grimwood to prove the incapacity of the deceased, the intrusion of the niece, Mrs. Bailey, and her fancying that those things had occurred which had not; saying on some occasions, for instance, that he had been riding out, when on that day he had not left the house. My visits were merely professional, and my enquiries were confined to the object of my visit: I did not enter into any question relating to his affairs, unless when the same were obtruded upon me. My attention was more drawn to the deceased's mental condition in August and September, on account of circumstances which I will more fully depose. In answer to the enquiries I made of the deceased in respect of his bodily state, his ordinary reply was 'Very poorly:' he did not enter into any description of his complaints or feelings; but he always knew me, and often asked me to take refreshment. From the limited intercourse I had with the deceased during the last two months of his life, I was able only to observe, in a general way, that he laboured under a considerable deficiency of memory, accompanied by an imbecility of mind, which, as I have already noticed, led him to fancy the reality of things which had never occurred. From the general observation made by me of the state of the deceased's mental faculties during the period of my attendance on him before mentioned, it is my opinion that he, the deceased, was not during August last, or subsequently, of sufficiently sound mind, memory, or understanding to make or duly execute a will. Having given this as my opinion, I feel myself bound to state that, having in the latter part of August been informed that the deceased had executed a new will, I, in a day or two after, took an opportunity, in order to ascertain the then state of his mind, of putting a question to him on the subject of his former employment, namely, of farming, and asked him what was the proper season for sowing winter tares; he answered, 'The sooner the better.' I then enquired whether there was any distinguishable difference between the seed of winter tares and of spring tares; his answer was to the effect that a difference would be seen by persons who were accustomed to them. There being two of his nieces (Mrs. Bailey and Miss Rolfe) present, I asked him, 'These ladies are more nearly allied to you, are they not, than Mrs. Sadler and her sisters?' He answered 'They are: there are three of each.' So far I consider the deceased to have answered me very rationally; but in two or three days after the foregoing conversation I, in further enquiry, said to the deceased, 'Have you thought of your will, Mr. Robinson?' He answered, 'I've nothing to leave;' and this answer was given as if he really thought so." On interrogatory, he answered, "I did previous to the deceased's death, in reply to a letter from W. Mason, Esq., write to him to the effect 'that I did not know what amount of intellect was necessary to constitute a legal competency.'"

---

On the 17th article Dr. Rolfe, the deceased's nephew, in deposing to an interview family into his house, and his dislike of the Baileys—particularly of Mr. Bailey—though it is proved that they had been in constant intercourse with the deceased, and had received presents from him, while with his sisters by the half blood he kept up little or no intimacy (nor indeed does Mary Hayward depose to any partiality of the deceased for them), and Mr. Mason had not been in his house for twelve years.(a)

But Hayward is not merely Grimwood's fellow witness, a great degree of intimacy has existed between them: she was, on the 27th of May, 1832 (the date of the first will) far advanced in her pregnancy, for on the 7th of June—the day on which the codicil giving to Grimwood a legacy of 200*l.* was executed—she was brought to bed of an illegitimate child, which was affiliated to this Grimwood on the 14th of September. In what a state then was the deceased's house in the months of May and June (and indeed previously), when [497] the former testamentary acts took place. Here were this confidential housekeeper and this man cohabiting together in the house, and, to the quantity of spirits consumed in it during a few months, the bills that I have referred to bear ample testimony. If the deceased had any intervals of sobriety and reason, he must have become sensible of the hands in which he was, of the mismanagement of his domestic affairs, of the conduct of the persons by whom he was surrounded, and he must have been anxious to be relieved from such a state.

Mrs. Bailey and her family, who had been in London during the winter and spring, went down to their residence at Wormingford on the 26th of May—the day before the execution of the first will. At that time the scandalous pregnancy of Mary Hayward must have been notorious in the parish—it could hardly be otherwise. On Mrs. Bailey's arrival at Wormingford, Hayward was still living in the deceased's house, and Mrs. Bailey did not then go to it. Mr. Bailey remained in London, doing his on the 13th of August, 1832, at Wormingford, at Mr. Bailey's, when the will of the 27th of May (which was well known) was spoken of, said: "Mr. Bailey designated the will as one which had been obtained from the deceased by undue influence, exercised, as he intimated, chiefly by Mr. George Tufnell: my sisters (Mrs. Bailey, Mrs. Chase, Miss Rolfe) also complained, as did Mr. Bailey, of the large donation of 1000*l.* out of so small a property as that of the deceased's to charity; and particularly of the large interest which was taken, amounting, as they said, to 200*l.* by Mr. William and Mr. George Tufnell. The will had produced general dissatisfaction among the family so assembled. I cannot depose that either Mr. Bailey or any one else did, in direct terms, intimate an intention of procuring or causing the deceased to execute a new will; but I had a strong idea that an intention was entertained among the family of procuring another will from the deceased, of which I, in my own mind, disapproved, on the ground of the dissension which I foresaw must be created by such a measure. My sister, Mrs. Bailey, on the said occasion, asked me whether I did not consider the deceased capable of making a will. I believe she used these words: 'You can't say that my uncle is not capable of making a will now: he is quite conscious of every thing about him.' I replied, 'I can't say much of his capabilities; but you can't think of troubling him to make a will: his bodily powers are too weak, and a business of that sort will agitate him too much,' or to that effect. I did not, in positive terms, declare that the deceased was altogether incapable of then making a new will, but I dwelt rather upon the impropriety of troubling him in his weak state of body. Previous to going over to Mr. Bailey's on that day I sat a short time—and a very short time—with the deceased: he did not recognize me when I first entered the room, but mistook me for one of the sons of Mrs. Bailey; he afterwards recollected me; he conversed very little; he never was a man of many words; his memory was much weakened, but he appeared to be quite conscious of what was passing; while I was there Mr. Abram Constable came into the room, and the deceased knew him. I did not apply any test to ascertain how far his mental faculties retained their vigour, and I had so little conversation with him that I cannot undertake to depose positively either way in respect of his testamentary capacity on that occasion. The opinion given to my sister and the others present in respect of procuring a new will from the deceased was given by me rather on a point of propriety than on a question of mental capacity."

---

(a) The two Misses Bailey, on the 20th interrogatory, spoke to this fact as coming from Mr. Mason on the occasion of a visit of about half an hour that he and his son paid to the deceased on the 12th of August, 1832.

duty in the Tower where he was chaplain, and where the cholera was at that time raging.

How, then, do the matters pleaded in the fifteenth article of the allegation stand upon the evidence? Did Mrs. Bailey intrude herself into the deceased's house, or was she invited by him? This is the important fact—the hinge on which the case turns. A piece of evidence bearing upon this point comes out from a witness examined on behalf of Mr. Tufnell, and a respectable witness—Abi Elliott, who had lived for twenty-nine years in the deceased's service as housekeeper, and is now far advanced in years, being at the time of her exa-[498]-mination of the age of 73: she is an annuitant under both wills, but for a less amount under the latter than under the former will: if, therefore, she has a bias, it will not be in favour of the latter will. She thus deposes on the 16th additional interrogatory: "The deceased did about June and the beginning of July last (1832) ask me to go and stay with him; he said 'he wanted somebody.' I told him I was very poorly and could not be of any use to him." This answer should be connected with what the witness had previously stated. On the 46th general interrogatory she had deposed—"It was said in May and June last that Mary Hayward, the deceased's servant, was with child by Spellen Grimwood: I do not believe that that report at all prevented Mrs. Bailey going to the deceased's house sooner than she did go: I never did advise or recommend Mrs. Bailey to reside with and take care of the deceased; I did recommend her to call and tell him how matters stood about Mary Hayward:" and on the 45th interrogatory—"It was not before, but after that I heard Mrs. Bailey had gone to reside at the deceased's house, that I said 'I was as pleased as if a person gave me a hundred pounds that Mrs. Bailey had gone there:' I said so, because I thought it would be a comfort to him."

Here, then, is this faithful old housekeeper advising Mrs. Bailey to acquaint the deceased with what was passing in his house, and expressing her joy when she heard she had gone to reside there: but what is of more importance is the fact that the deceased himself (before Mrs. Bailey went to reside in the house)—aware "that things were not going on right at his house"—wished his old housekeeper to come and stay with him, "for he wanted somebody." Mrs. Elliott, from her age and infirmities, [499] being unable to go, what then took place? The deceased himself drove down to Mrs. Bailey's; he was at that time infirm, and he did not get out of his carriage; but his niece and her family went out to him, and he courted them to come and stay at his house. Mrs. Bailey at first rather declined, and the deceased pressed and intreated her, according to Miss Margaret Bailey's account of what passed; for she states thus (after mentioning that the deceased did not alight from his carriage, it being too much trouble for him to ascend and descend): "It was after some indifferent conversation that he said to my mother, 'Well, Harriett, I wish you could come and be with me, for I don't think things go on as they should.' I did not pay much attention to what passed, for I was moving about at the time; it appeared to me that my mother shifted the matter, and said it would be inconvenient for her to leave home; and in his way he said, 'Well, I wish you would come, and as many as can come.' I do not think there was much said on the subject, but I did not hear all, for I was running about getting fruit; but I collected enough to know that Mr. Robinson had asked my mother to go and stay with him, because things were not going on right, as he thought, at his house; and that my mother had declined it rather on the ground of the inconvenience of leaving her own home."

And that the deceased was aware that things were not going on as they ought at his own house is, as I have already pointed out, confirmed by the old housekeeper:

"On the 27th of July I called upon Mr. Robinson with my mother, and he was then very urgent with my mother to come and stay at his house, [500] and he almost cried; and it was not until then that we thought him so ill as he really was: he complained of being very ill, and said he should never be well again: he said to my mother, 'If you don't come, I do not know who to ask—I can place dependence in nobody now;' and besides he said to my mother, 'I want you to be with me—there are plenty of rooms up stairs—I am too ill to be left to myself—if ever I wanted seeing after, it is now: I do not want to find fault with any one in particular—you will see how things go on, and you must guess at a great deal: you ought to come and look after things, for if there is five shillings to spare you will share it amongst you.' He expressed himself to that effect, and much more to the same purpose he said, which I do not remember."

Now this matter does not depend upon the testimony of one or two witnesses, for there are no less than six who depose to the fact that the deceased did himself invite his niece, Mrs. Bailey, to take up her residence with him: even the evidence of Abi Elliott alone would leave no doubt upon this important point. Yet Grimwood and Mary Hayward have been brought forward to give a different colour to this fact and to support the allegation—that Mrs. Bailey and her family forced themselves on the deceased, he being in a state of diminished capacity and unable to resist the intrusion; this—the very ground-work and substratum of the opposition to the will of the 27th of August—is a false foundation.

It is very probable, and I am disposed so to consider it, that Mr. Tufnell received his information from Spellen Grimwood; but if Mr. Tufnell chose to trust to the representations of his parish-clerk, whom he had appointed to that office; [501] who, for aught that appears, still continues in that office, and who is a releasing witness—or to the representations of Mary Hayward—and if he and his co-executor chose to act upon the representations of such persons, and to found upon them charges of fraud, conspiracy, and perjury, the parties making such charges necessarily do it (however much I may lament it) at their own risk and peril, and are responsible for the consequences.

Mrs. Bailey and some of the family, in consequence of the urgent invitations and intreaties of the deceased, went to reside at his house in the latter end of the month of July. It was at that time well known to Mrs. Bailey that the deceased had executed testamentary acts (though she was not aware of the contents) under Mr. Tufnell's advice, and that he was an executor: but having, shortly afterwards, accidentally discovered that his brother, Mr. W. Tufnell, who was indebted to the deceased in a bond for 1700*l.*, had been under his will acquitted, as a legacy, of 700*l.*,(a)[1] Mrs. Bailey became somewhat alarmed, or, as one of the witnesses expresses it, "rather nettled," and she thereupon, not unfairly nor improperly I think, remonstrated with the deceased, and represented to him that he had favoured a stranger to the prejudice of his near relations, and might otherwise have been led to do an act of injustice.

It does appear that in the beginning of August, on Mr. Bailey's return to Wormingford, a will was prepared to be submitted to the deceased, and I must make some observations upon its contents. In substance it is as follows: (b) it appoints Mr. [502] Bailey and Mr. James Daniell executors; it directs them to invest 300*l.* in the names of Mr. Bailey and Mr. Constable, the interest to be divided among the poor of Wormingford; it bequeaths an annuity of 12*l.* to Mary Hayward,(a)[2] a legacy of 40*l.* to Abi Elliott, of 20*l.* to Grimwood, and 5*l.* to Brown; it further gives 100*l.* to each of his sisters of the half blood, and 50*l.* to Abram Constable; to W. Rolfe the freehold house at Wormingford; and to Miss Rolfe and Mr. Chase his freehold farm; and it gives to the two Rolfes and to Mrs. Chase the residue.

Such are the contents of this paper. Mr. James Daniell, who prepared it, drew it from instructions he received from Mr. Bailey; but of what had previously passed between him or Mrs. Bailey and the deceased there is no evidence. The instructions might have originated with the Baileys, and the deceased only have given a general assent that he would make a new will in the place of Mr. Tufnell's will, if they would get one drawn and submitted to him; certainly at that time the Baileys did not know the exact contents of that will, nor the precise amount of the deceased's property. Grimwood states, on the 15th interrogatory, that the matter originated in this way:—

"Within and about ten days after the 28th of July I one day overheard Mrs. Bailey saying to the deceased, 'Well now, uncle, if there was a regular will drawn up, would you agree to it?' I thereupon went to the Rev. George Tufnell, and told him that, and of other things which had happened since the Baileys came to the house, and had led me to believe that another will was about to be made. I told him I did not think the deceased [503] in a fit state to make a will: Mr. Tufnell asked me why I thought so: I told him that I had taken notice of what had been said and done by him lately, and that I had written some of it down. Mr. Tufnell answered that it was all very well, and might not be amiss for me to do so; but he never did desire

---

(a)[1] This appeared from the endorsement upon the bond itself; the bond was annexed as an exhibit to Mr. Constable's and Mr. Bailey's allegation.

(b) See ante, Comparative Abstract—will of 8th or 9th of August.

(a)[2] In the will written "Howard."

me to watch the conduct of the family of Mr. Bailey, or to observe on what passed in the deceased's house while they should remain there, or to report to him what might occur: but I did, from what Mr. Tufnell then said, consider that he sanctioned my continuing to take notes of what might thenceforward take place." Mr. Tufnell, therefore, was, as I have stated, receiving information from, and probably has been sincerely deceived by the representations of, this man.

Suppose, then, that the instructions of the 8th of August did originate from the remonstrances of Mrs. Bailey, in the way this witness has suggested, yet that would not of itself vitiate a testamentary act. A will being accordingly prepared by Mr. James Daniell, he took it over to Wormingford on the 9th for execution, but did not arrive till three o'clock, which was after the time appointed; and he was then informed that the deceased could not see him—he was too much fatigued—and that the execution must be postponed.(a) The reason [504] thus given might have been one reason for postponing the execution; there might have been additional reasons (for what exactly had passed respecting this will the Court has no means of knowing); there might have been objections taken by the deceased himself to the contents of the instrument; he might have thought a different disposition more fair and proper, and have said, "You should have consulted me—the matter must be reconsidered." Such conduct in the deceased would not have been unnatural; but, at any rate, the transaction has to my judgment no appearance of fraud on the part of Mr. Bailey; the will cannot have been made with a view to his own advantage, for he and his family take no interest [505] whatever under it; they are excluded by this paper from any share in the deceased's property, while almost the whole benefit is given to his other relations: as far as the Baileys are concerned, this will would seem to have been intended to defeat the former will; but, whatever may have been its origin or object, I can see no ground for ascribing fraud to Mr. Bailey.

Suppose, however, that this will was prepared without any detailed instructions from the deceased, with the view and purpose of being submitted to his consideration—to reject, to alter, or to adopt—the fact is that it was not adopted; and there was then nothing, I say, unnatural or improbable that, upon a further discussion of the subject with the deceased, he should have given different instructions, or at least sufficiently

---

(a) Mr. James Daniell (brother of Edward) deposed: "I am an attorney at law at Colchester: I never had the least acquaintance with Mr. James Robinson, late of Wormingford, in the county of Essex, the party deceased in this cause: save the occasion now to be mentioned, I never was employed concerning his testamentary affairs. On the 8th of August last, the Reverend Mr. Bailey, with whom I had no previous acquaintance, called on me at my office, stating that the deceased wished him to procure a will to be prepared, and he then produced a paper from which he dictated to me the substance of a will, which instructions I reduced into writing, and from which I subsequently prepared a will for execution: in the will so prepared for execution he, Mr. Bailey, and myself were named as the executors: that will was never executed as I believe: at the desire of Reverend Mr. Bailey I attended at the deceased's house at Wormingford on the following day, carrying with me the will I had so prepared: on arriving at the deceased's house I found that I was rather beyond the time appointed, and Mr. Bailey met me at the door, saying that he was afraid that Mr. Robinson was too much fatigued to do anything on that day; this must have occurred at about three o'clock, p.m. I, however, remained there about half an hour, at the end of which time Mr. Bailey (who apparently had in the meantime been in communication with the deceased) came from another room and informed me that the deceased was too much fatigued to attend to business on that day, and that he (Bailey) would let me know when the deceased wished to see me. I never had any further communication on the subject with Mr. Bailey: the will so prepared was left with him." On interrogatories: "Mr. Bailey, when giving me the instructions, informed me that the deceased wished him to be the sole executor; but he (Bailey) said it was usual to have some professional man joined, and he on that account asked me to act with him; that the deceased, he was sure, would approve of it; I consented, and my name was accordingly inserted." "Mr. Bailey said that he had employed my late father (a solicitor) some years ago; and he particularly inquired of me to ascertain whether I was one of his sons: he gave no reason why I was applied to in particular to make the will."

consented to the disposition contained in the subsequent will of the 27th of August. There is not, in my opinion, any thing inconsistent with the evidence that the transaction should have taken that course.

On the 12th of August Mr. Bailey's sons obtain somewhat of a detailed knowledge of the contents of the May will: they had, one or two days before, made an application to Mr. Tufnell for the will itself, which he refused to deliver up, but at the same time did not object to communicate the contents to Mrs. Bailey and the family, and appointed the 12th for that purpose. On the evening of the day on which this application was made, Mr. Tufnell called at the deceased's house, and either then, or perhaps on the preceding day, conversed with the deceased; and he states himself that afterwards he went to the deceased's house, and saw him frequently. On the 12th, in the afternoon, Mrs. Bailey's two sons went by her [506] direction to Mr. Tufnell's house; they there found Mr. Mason, his co-executor, who read over the will to these young men, and they, as far as their recollection served, carried away the particulars in their minds.(a) After this, Mr. Mason also, accompanied by his son, went to the deceased's, and they were both admitted; indeed they were at no time excluded: so that access to the deceased was not refused. At this interview of the 12th, Mr. Mason appears to have had a long conversation with the deceased. It is not necessary for the Court to enter into a minute examination of what then passed; but if the two daughters of Mr. Bailey have given a misrepresentation of that interview, of the conversation, and of the capacity of the deceased on that occasion,(b) Mr. Mason's son might easily have been examined to contradict them.

The transaction then arrives at the 18th of August, as already stated from the evidence on the condidit. What had occurred in the mean time, from the 8th to the 18th, between Mr. or Mrs. Bailey, or both, and the deceased, is not in evidence: but if what is stated to have occurred afterwards be true, the deceased must have consented to and approved of making a will, giving much the same legacies to the whole and to the half-blood as by the former will of May, but giving the real estates and residue to the whole blood and to his cousin, Abram Constable, appointing him and Mr. Bailey executors, and excluding Mr. Tuf-[507]-nell from the executorship and a share of the residue. In this view of the case, omitting some of the minute parts, I can discover nothing sufficient to shake and falsify the evidence of the attesting witnesses upon the condidit, and to induce me to suppose that the case in support of the will to which they depose is made up of fraud, conspiracy, falsehood, and perjury. It is true that two of these witnesses are nearly connected with the executors of this will, but after a careful examination and consideration of the whole tone and character of their depositions—for the tone and character of depositions are often better criteria of judging the credit due to witnesses than minute variations between witness and witness—it appears to me that they have candidly and fairly wished to state the truth according to their best recollection and their real impression of the facts.

The charges against Mr. Bailey and his family of fraud, imposition, conspiracy, and perjury, seem to me by no means established; possibly—indeed very likely—they have originated in the representations of Spellen Grimwood and Mary Hayward —persons living together in the deceased's house at the time of his intemperate habits in a state of unlawful cohabitation: but, in my opinion, these representations are unfounded. It is proved to me quite satisfactorily that when Mrs. Bailey and her family went to reside at the deceased's house, it was by his own express invitation; the idea originated with the deceased himself: and this circumstance, I think, furnishes a safe clue to the sequel of the history.

The will of the 27th of May was, as I have remarked, made under such circumstances, and in [508] such a way, that a departure from it was neither improbable nor improper: and being satisfied that the will of the 27th of August is sufficiently proved, I am bound to pronounce for it.

With respect to costs, they have been pressed on account of the persevering attacks upon the character of Mr. Bailey and his family: and it is with some reluctance that

---

(a) Mr. W. Bailey, on the 14th interrogatory, addressed to him as a witness on the condidit, and the answer of Mr. Constable and Mr. Bailey to the 16th article of the adverse allegation give the above account.

(b) In their respective answers to the 20th interrogatory.

I feel called upon to give costs; but if parties will receive information that has no foundation in truth from individuals of bad character, and will act upon that information in the conduct of a cause, they must be responsible for the consequences. I think it by no means improbable that the executors, particularly Mr. Tufnell, has been imposed upon by misrepresentations, but that is no justification of their opposition to this will, nor of the charges (which they ought to have known were groundless) upon which that opposition was founded. I am therefore bound, in justice to the other parties, to condemn the executors of the former will in the costs of this suit.

The Court pronounced for the force and validity of the will of 27th of August, 1832, and condemned Mr. Tufnell and Mr. Mason in costs.

[509] SMYTH v. SMYTH. Arches Court, Easter Term, 4th Session, 1833.—A suit for cruelty and adultery, brought by the wife, was appealed from the Consistory Court of London to the Arches, and in 1828 was there alleged to be agreed, and the husband dismissed; but the inhibition to the Consistory was not relaxed. In 1831 a suit for cruelty and adultery was again brought by the wife in the Consistory; the husband appeared under protest; the judge, having directed the wife's libel (which referred to and prayed leave to invoke the proceedings in the former suit, and also pleaded new facts) to be brought in, over-ruled the protest; but, on the ground that the inhibition was still in force, did not assign the husband to appear absolutely, nor did it dismiss him, nor admit nor reject the libel. The wife appealed: that appeal was dismissed for irregularity, and the cause remitted: the judge below, as still inhibited, refused to proceed: the wife again appealed; and the Court of Arches held that the agreement and consequent dismissal of the husband put an end to the former suit, and consequently to the inhibition, and that the judge of the Consistory Court was bound to proceed in the cause.

This was an appeal by the wife from the Consistory Court of London upon a grievance. On the 11th of May, 1831, the proctor for the wife had, in the Consistory Court, alleged that a former suit, between the same parties, and appealed to the Arches, had been there agreed, and that in May, 1828, the husband had been thereupon dismissed by consent of the wife's proctor, and that no suit between the parties was pending in the Court of Arches or Delegates; and, in proof thereof, brought in an office copy of the decree of the Court of Arches dismissing Mr. Smyth. The Judge of the Consistory refused to direct the husband to appear absolutely, or to admit the libel, on the ground that the inhibition was so far in force that the Judge of the Consistory Court ought to defer to it. The wife appealed to the Arches: that appeal was dismissed on the ground of irregularity, both in the Arches and Delegates; (a) and that cause having been remitted to the Arches, the Judge of that Court, on the fourth session of [510] Michaelmas Term, 1832, relaxed the inhibition to the Judge of the Consistory decreed in the present suit, but, though prayed, made no order as to the inhibition in the former suit.

On the second session of Hilary Term, 1833, Mrs. Smyth, in person, brought into the Consistory Court the relaxation of the inhibition: and the Judge thereof decreed to proceed according to the tenor of former acts. On the fourth session Mrs. Smyth tendered additional articles to her libel, with an exhibit annexed; and prayed leave to correct the ninth and tenth articles of the libel, by substituting "December" for "November;" and further, that the Judge of the Consistory would assign "to hear on admission of the libel and exhibits, as altered, and of the additional articles, on the by-day."

The Judge refused to receive the additional articles, and rejected the prayers of Mrs. Smyth; and this was the grievance—the subject matter of the present appeal which was interposed by the wife.

The husband appeared to the inhibition and citation, and after the usual steps the cause, on the fourth session standing assigned "for informations and sentence, and W. H. C. Smyth [the husband] is admonished to attend," Mrs. Smyth prayed the Court "to reverse the decree appealed from—retain the cause, decree a monition for the Court below to transmit the libel and exhibits there given in on her behalf, and, when transmitted, permit her to correct them and bring in additional articles."

(a) See a report of the proceedings in some of the earlier stages, and in these appeals, supra, p. 72-7; and infra, p. 516, for a report of Dr. Lushington's judgment in the Consistory Court.

Mr. Smyth, in person, prayed the Court to affirm the decree, and remit the cause.

[511] Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. This matter is now before me as an appeal from a grievance: in the Consistory Court it was a suit instituted by the wife charging her husband with cruelty and adultery. Both parties are without proctor or counsel —a most unusual and inconvenient form of appearance—throwing upon the Court a burden which should not be imposed upon it; and in the present case this appearance in person, both by plaintiff and defendant, is the more extraordinary, as from the former proceedings between them the Court has no reason to think that there is any want of "faculties" in the husband; and the wife is entitled to have her costs taxed, de die in diem.(a) From the minute also of the 11th of May, 1831, namely, upon the third session of Easter Term, I perceive that the wife appealed to this Court by her proctor; but as she now thinks proper to appear in this form, I have no power to make any order upon the matter.

Upon the appeal in 1831 this Court, though possibly of opinion that the original cause ought to have gone on, was bound to dismiss the appeal as void for irregularity; the Court of Delegates having affirmed this decree remitted the cause to this Court; and as soon as the cause had travelled back to the Consistory Court, it was the duty of that Court to "proceed according to the tenor of former acts," as it is technically expressed—namely, to proceed with the cause as it stood assigned in that Court on the 11th of May, 1831. [512] The libel and exhibits on that day stood on admission; they have not been rejected nor admitted, nor is the husband dismissed. Upon this fresh appeal the question for me now to decide is whether the Judge of the Consistory Court has done right in not allowing the wife's additional articles to her libel to be received; and in rejecting her other prayers. I may here observe that, in the suspended state in which the libel stood, it was quite competent to the wife to pray either to correct the libel, or to give in additional articles, or both, so that the statement might stand for admission in a complete form.

The Court cannot here but lament the slow progress of this suit: it is upwards of two years since the wife took out her citation, and the libel is not yet admitted. The libel indeed shews that there was a previous suit between these parties in 1824, which in 1828, while the suit was depending here upon appeal, was agreed, and the husband thereupon dismissed.

The Court has no means of preventing a husband and wife from thus harassing each other, but it would have been better, in my opinion, if the husband, in the first instance, had met the question fairly, and not retarded, by objections of form, the investigation into his wife's complaint.

From the Judge of the Consistory Court (as appears from the minute) overruling the protest of the husband upon the 11th of May, 1831, yet not assigning him to appear absolutely—from his having on a previous day given leave to the wife to bring in her libel and exhibits, yet not admitting nor rejecting them—from his subsequently, in 1833, not allowing the wife to amend her libel, and from his refusing to receive the additional articles, [513] and to assign to hear on admission thereof, and of the libel, I am led to infer that the learned Judge of that Court acted upon this notion, that he had no authority to proceed in the cause, inasmuch as that his hands were tied by the inhibition in the former suit between these parties having never, in form, been relaxed; but the minute of this Court, in 1828, shews that the cause in which that inhibition had been served was then agreed, and the husband, or, in other words, the cause, dismissed; this is tantamount to the formal relaxation of an inhibition; the agreement and dismissal supplied its place—they extinguished the suit, and consequently the inhibition; the suit and every thing that had taken place under it was at an end by the agreement and dismissal. I feel, therefore, some difficulty in adopting the notion of the learned Judge, that his hands were any longer tied by that inhibition. A fresh suit, in which new facts are alleged, has been instituted in the Consistory between these parties, and in this fresh suit there has been an inhibition served upon that Court: but again, that inhibition has been relaxed; and the relaxation brought in. How then can the Court below be precluded from proceeding in this cause?

(a) Bray v. Bray, 1 Hagg. Ecc. 168. Cheale v. Cheale, ib. 375. D'Aguilar v. D'Aguilar, ib. 787. Westmeath v. Westmeath, 2 Hagg. Ecc. (Supplement) 133.

In 1828, when the husband was dismissed, the suit then pending stood assigned "for informations and sentence." What, then, was the effect of the agreement and dismissal? That the wife waived her remedy—that the agreement and dismissal were tantamount to an admission on her part either of a failure of proof or of a condonation; she is then barred from praying relief upon proof of those former charges alone, but she is not barred against a remedy for new acts—nay, in [514] the same manner perhaps as the law regards new acts pleaded after condonation, the former acts might even be revived.(a)[1]

Again, what is the legal character of these parties?—husband and wife. In legal contemplation that mutual relation still exists, for any private understanding or agreement to live separate is not recognized by the law.(b) Suppose in 1829, or at any time subsequent to the termination of the first suit, the husband had lived in open adultery; or suppose various acts on his part of personal violence—of manifest cruelty towards his wife—would she be compelled to endure such treatment without a remedy? Would she be entitled to no relief—no protection by law? And to what law could she apply but to the matrimonial law administered in a matrimonial court—the court of that diocese in which the husband was residing? The wife could not, in such a case, resort in the first instance to any other court: an action at common law would not lie, and the Court of Arches has only an appellate jurisdiction in the matter; and the former suit between these parties, which had come before this Court on appeal, was at an end.

The Judge of the Consistory Court, therefore, in my opinion, did wrong in not entertaining this suit, so far as to receive the additional articles, and examine whether the libel, so assisted, did contain [515] such matter as might form the foundation of an entire new suit; and whether also there might not even be sufficient to revive the former charges: thus far, I think, the wife was entitled to be heard. It is not, however, for me at present to consider the effect of the libel; still less of the additional articles, which, not being received by the Court below, are not before me. I can therefore form no opinion upon one or the other; but considering this case without reference to their contents, I must endeavour to place the suit where it stood on the 11th of May, 1831—that is the shape that it ought to assume; I accordingly pronounce for the appeal; allow the additional articles, if tendered by the wife in this Court, to be brought into the registry (for as they have not been received it rests with the wife to annex them or not), and if brought in, the libel and additional articles will together stand on admission. The Court will then have to adopt one of three courses, —either to admit the whole; reject the whole; or, if there should be irregularities or defects, to direct any part to be amended and reformed.

Having now disposed of the appeal, I strongly recommend both parties to reconsider together whether they cannot do effectually what in 1828 they thought that they had done—viz. carry into effect a private arrangement; whether this will not be most consistent with their own welfare and interest. I trust that the intervention of friends may prevent the continuance of an harassing suit; or, at all events, that should such an intervention not be successful, the cause will be conducted by professional agents.

[516] Consistory Court, Easter Term, 3rd Session, 1831.—The libel, in a suit for cruelty and adultery, disclosing the existence of a former suit between the same parties, partly on the same facts, and that such former suit was appealed, and in the Superior Court dismissed, by consent, before sentence, held, that the Inferior Court cannot hear on the admissibility of such libel, the inhibition in the former suit not having been expressly relaxed.

Judgment (a)[2]—Dr. Lushington. In the early part of this year a citation—taken out by a person alleging herself to be the wife of W. H. C. Smyth, and calling upon him to answer in a suit for cruelty and adultery—was returned into this Court. Mr.

(a)[1] Durant v. Durant, 1 Hagg. Ecc. 733. D'Aguilar v. D'Aguilar, ib. 781. Westmeath v. Westmeath, 2 vol. (Supplement). Timmings v. Timmings, 3 vol. 83.

(b) Nash v. Nash, 1 Hagg. Con. 142. Beeby v. Beeby, ibid. notis: and S. C. 1 Hagg. Ecc. 789. Mortimer v. Mortimer, 2 Hagg. Con. 318. Barker v. Barker, 2 Add. 285. Sullivan v. Sullivan, ibid. 299. Westmeath v. Westmeath, Jacob, 126. Roper on Husband and Wife (ed. by Jacob), vol. 2, p. 270, in notis.

(a)[2] See ante, p. 509.

Smyth appeared under protest; and after having heard him on a former day in support of this protest, I have no doubt in what way I shall dispose of it, namely, to overrule it.

Another difficulty, however, strikes me. It appears from the records of this Court —and the fact is distinctly recognized by the libel (b)—that in a suit, by reason of cruelty and adultery, and depending in this Court between these same parties, there was an appeal prosecuted in the Arches; [517] and the inhibition consequent upon that appeal has never, I understand, been relaxed: but it is alleged that that cause was agreed in 1828, and Mr. Smyth thereupon dismissed; and an office copy of the minute of the Court of Arches to that effect has been brought in. It is now suggested that subsequent acts have revived the previous charges against the husband, and the Court is asked to allow the matters pleaded in the former libel—the evidence taken upon it—and the acts and records of this Court and of the Court of Arches to be imported into a new libel. Such a course of proceeding will, it is said by the counsel for Mrs. Smyth, be beneficial to the husband; but I am not aware of an instance in which such a course has been adopted; and I must take care that, in seeking to do justice in an individual case, and without precedent to guide me, I do not myself attempt to establish a dangerous precedent. I either must treat this suit as a new or an old [518] suit: I cannot treat it as a new suit because the contrary is expressly alleged; and if I treat it as part of the old suit, then this Court is, in my judgment, under an inhibition.

Where parties choose to abandon legal modes of redress, and resort to agreements, and those not validly drawn up, a Court of Justice will, I conceive, be very reluctant to step out of its way to assist them; and if a cause pending before me were stopped by private arrangement, I should take time to consider whether I could permit the suit to be revived, merely because an agreement, alleged to have been entered into, had not been, or could not be, fully carried into effect: and in the consideration of such a matter it might be proper to bear in mind that precedents are not wanting of injunctions, in former times, to the Prerogative Court, where parties interested in the effects of a deceased have attempted to proceed in that Court after an agreement.(a)

But I am not called upon at present to express any opinion whether the averments

---

(b) The libel bore date on the 1st Session of Easter Term, 1831; it consisted of fifteen articles and five exhibits; the first article pleaded "that W. H. C. Smyth and Eliza Ann C. Smyth, his wife, the parties in this cause, intermarried, as pleaded and set forth in a certain libel with exhibits thereto annexed, given in and now remaining in the registry of this Court, and admitted in a certain cause of separation or divorce from bed, board, and mutual cohabitation, by reason of cruelty and adultery, brought by the said E. A. C. Smyth against her said husband, and which was depending in this Court between the said parties in 1824, 1825, 1826 and 1827; that after the said marriage the said W. H. C. Smyth behaved with great cruelty to his said wife, and committed the foul crime of adultery with (&c.), as also pleaded in the said libel and an additional article thereto; and the marriage of the said parties was confessed. the facts of cruelty and adultery were set forth and pleaded, and witnesses examined in proof thereof, and publication of their sayings and depositions decreed, and the cause concluded and assigned for sentence; that the said cause was not proceeded in to informations and sentence by reason of the said W. H. C. Smyth resisting the payment of costs and alimony, and he prosecuted an appeal to the Arches Court in relation to a pretended grievance, which appeal was pronounced against, but the cause was retained in the said Court at petition of both proctors; and in consequence of the continued resistance of W. H. C. S. to the payment of costs and alimony, the said cause was not brought to informations and sentence in the Court of Arches, and the party proponent in verification of the premises craved leave to refer to the acts and records of this Court and of the Court of Arches."

The second pleaded certain terms of compromise, that no deed of separation, or instrument to the effect thereof, was ever drawn out; but that, on the faith of the same, E. A. C. Smyth instructed her proctor to allege the cause to be agreed, and it was accordingly so declared on the 4th Session of East. Term, 1828 (in the Arches), and the husband dismissed.

The remaining articles pleaded circumstances, in date, subsequent to the above minute.

(a) See dictum by Lord Chancellor Hardwicke in Barnesley v. Powell, 1 Ves. 288.

in this libel, subsequent to the date of the agreement, are sufficient to revive former acts. The first point for consideration is whether I have any right to proceed at all: the Court of Arches must, as it appears to me, determine that point; I am inhibited by its superior authority, its inhibition upon this Court still remains unrelaxed, and I am bound to defer to it.

The course I propose to follow is—to overrule Mr. Smyth's protest, because it cannot in law be sustained; but I shall abstain from directing him [519] to appear absolutely, because from the inhibition on record in this Court, and from the contents of the libel before me, it appears to me that I am precluded from taking at present any further or other steps. The wife may resort to the Superior Court and obtain a decision upon the validity of the inhibition; and perhaps the learned Judge presiding in the Court of Arches, and where the appeal between these parties was lodged, may retain the cause.

The Court overruled the protest; but did not direct the husband to appear absolutely, nor did it admit the libel.

End of the Sittings after Hilary Term.

TABLE OF CASES IN VOLUME II.

Printed by Green & Son, Edinburgh.